Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD two articles on aid to the Contras that I thought might be helpful as our colleagues consider their vote on this most important issue. One is a poll published in today's New York Times, which talks about the extensive opposition against Contra aid among many Americans. The other is an editorial from today's Washington Post on why we should press for negotiations rather than aid to the Contras. I hope my colleagues will find them useful.

POLL SHOWS CONFUSION ON AID TO CONTRAS

(By David K. Shipler)

Americans are uncertain about which side the United States is backing in Nicaragua and only one out of four supports President Reagan's request for $100 milllion in aid to the rebels who are trying to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

With the approach of another key vote by the House of Representatives on the President's proposal, majorities of those polled accepted his argument that Nicaragua is a risk to American interests, but opposed his remedy of $100 million in aid.

Only 38 percent knew that Washington was supporting the guerrillas and not the Government. That confusion extended to the nature of Nicaragua's Government, which is aligned with the Soviet Union; just 20 percent said it was Communist, 19 percent said it was a right-wing dictatorship and 49 percent said they didn't know.

NICARAGUAN THREAT PERCEIVED

Nevertheless, after questions about the Reagan aid plan had been asked, a more defined image of Nicaragua seemed to emerge. Fifty-nine percent of the 1,601 adults interviewed by telephone from April 6 through 10 answered yes when asked if they thought the Nicaraguan Government would provide the Soviet Union with military bases, and 56 percent agreed that Nicaragua constituted a threat to the security of other Central American countries. The survey's margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

It therefore appeared that President Reagan had succeeded only partially in his efforts to sway the American public toward his views on Central America. There was concern, but it failed to translate into support for action by the United States.

Citing the risk of another Vietnam, the need to address domestic problems and a conviction that the money would be wasted, only 25 percent expressed a willingness to assist the contras. Sixty-two percent opposed the aid, and 12 percent had no opinion.

A FINANCIAL DRAIN IS SEEN

"If we had some assurance that the money would do the job, that would be one thing," said Thomas Haeger of Vancouver, Wash., who described himself as a conservative Republican. "But it would just be the beginning of years of a financial drain. After Vietnam we don't need the money worry or the emotional worry."

As the example of Mr. Haeger illustrated, opposition to the aid request came even from the ranks of President Reagan's supporters. Even those who approved of the way in which Mr. Reagan was handling his job as President—a very strong 64 percent of the total—rejected aid to the contras by a margin of 52 to 35 percent. Those who described themselves as conservatives opposed it by 57 to 30 percent and Republicans by 51 to 36 percent.

The survey was done after weeks of vigorous debate in Washington over the Nicaragua issue. The Reagan Administration is seeking to end a two-year Congressional ban on military aid to the contras—$27 million in nonlethal aid was provided during the fiscal year ending last March 31—but has encountered considerable opposition, especially in the Democratic-controlled House.

VOTE SCHEDULED FOR TUESDAY

Last month, the House narrowly defeated the Administration's request. The Republican-controlled Senate then passed a compromise, under which the aid would be withheld pending diplomatic efforts to get Nicaragua's agreement to move toward internal democratization and refrain from supporting insurgencies against its Central American neighbors. The House vote Tuesday is expected to be close.

Judging from the results of the Times/CBS News Poll, the contra aid issue appears to have tapped a deep well of ambivalence over the place of the United States in countering undemocratic, pro-American regimes.

Asked whether Washington should back a right-wing dictatorship friendly to the United States or urge free elections even if they might lead to a Communist government, those surveyed opted for the elections by a margin of 40 to 33 percent.

The public also expressed more willingness to criticize such governments than to try to change them. To the question, "Should the United States criticize governments that deny human rights to their citizens, even if those governments support us on important foreign policy issues?" 54 percent said yes and 31 percent said no. But opposite sentiments were evoked by the question "Should the United States try to change a dictatorship to a democracy where it can, or should the United States stay out of other countries' affairs?" Sixty-two percent said stay out, and 28 percent said try to change.

TERRORISM SEEN AS TOP PROBLEM

Terrorism, not Central America, was listed most frequently as the most important problem facing this country, followed by the economy, unemployment, the risk of nuclear war and the budget deficit. Only 12 of the 1,601 persons questioned mentioned Central America as the United States' chief worry.

Few of the aid proponents accepted the idea of American military intervention, and some saw money as a way of avoiding a deeper entanglement. "If we don't help, it will turn out like Cuba—we'll be threatened from all sides," said Eva Gramm, a restaurant cook in Avon, S.D., "I have three sons—one is eligible for the draft," she continued. "I think we should send money and keep our troops out."

"I'd rather send money than troops," said Robert Thomas, an electrician from Easton, Pa. "That's where we have to draw the line: no troops, no advisers."

Indeed, when a suggestion was made to include American personnel in the aid, the survey showed support for American involvement dropping sharply. The 25 percent who favored funds to the contras fell to 16 percent when asked whether they would favor American military advisers if the money "did not work." Then, if advisers "did not work," they were asked whether they would favor sending United States combat troops. Only 10 percent said yes.

NO GROUP FAVORED AID

Opposition to aid for the contras crossed all political, ethnic and regional and socioeconomic lines. No demographic group favored it. But within that broad picture, some differences emerged. Aid was opposed by a lower percentage of men than women, whites than blacks, Republicans than Democrats and conservatives than liberals.

The higher the education and income, the less the opposition. Those earning more than $50,000 a year were against aid by a margin of 52 to 40 percent, while those earning less than $12,500 a year opposed it by 68 to 17 percent. Similarly, college graduates were against it by 53 to 33 percent, and those with less than a high school education by 68 to 17 percent.

The shadow of the long, losing war in Vietnam appeared to hang over the prospect of involvement in Central America. Sixty-two percent of the respondents said that they feared that the United States would get involved in Nicaragua the way it did in Vietnam, although when asked to volunteer reasons for opposing contra aid, only 2 percent mentioned "another Vietnam" and the danger of escalation.

Some proponents of aid dismissed the Vietnam analogy. "We won't have another Vietnam," said Eva Gramm. "It was a harsh lesson; it won't happen again."

The most frequent reason given against the aid, and given most often by urban residents and those with lower incomes and less education, was that problems in the United States were more important. Of those opposing assistance, 44 percent said the $100 million should be spent on domestic problems.

In addition, follow-up interviews revealed some skepticism about the contras' abilities and a fear that money would be pocketed by corrupt rebels. Some respondents pointed to the example of Ferdinand E. Marcos, the former President of the Philippines, who has been accused of enriching himself with American Government funds.

"If we give money to the contras, we should monitor where and how it is being spent," said Mary Battle of Riveredge, N.J.

Based on 1,601 telephone interveiws conducted April 6–10

HOW THE SURVEY WAS CONDUCTED

The latest New York Times/CBS News Poll is based on telephone interviews conducted April 6 through 10 with 1,601 adults around the United States, excluding Alaska and Hawaii.

The sample of telephone exchanges called was selected by a computer from a complete list of exchanges in the country. The exchanges were chosen so as to insure that each region of the country was represented in proportion to its population. For each exchange, the telephone numbers were formed by random digits, thus permitting access to both listed and unlisted residential numbers.

The results have been weighted to take account of household size and number of residential telephones and to adjust for variations in the sample relating to region, race, sex, age and education.

In theory, in 19 cases out of 20 the results based on such samples will differ by no more than 3 percentage points in either direction from what would have been obtained by interviewing all adult Americans. The error for smaller subgroups is larger. For example, for either Republicans or Democrats the potential error is plus or minus four percentage points.

In addition to sampling error, the practical difficulties of conducting any survey of public opinion may introduce other sources of error into the poll.

THE CONTRA AID VOTE

Two weekends ago in Panama, the would-be mediators of the Contadora group struggled to find a way to ease the gathering confrontation between the United States and Nicaragua. The Sandinistas defiantly rejected all steps the would-be mediators urged on them. Last weekend, however, they edged back a bit, agreeing to accept a deadline of June 6 for the signing of a regional peace treaty, with two conditions: that the points of the treaty still in dispute be resolved, and that the United States halt "aggression" against Managua. Presumably this was done at least in part to assure members of the House, who are about to vote on contra aid, that there is a valid diplomatic alternative to the Reagan administration's course.

The eight Latin governments supporting the Contadora initiative believe there is. If Washington cut off the contras, they argue, a workable regional security treaty could be put in place, and in the resulting calm, Nicaragua could be induced to slow and reverse its totalitarian progress. For its part, the Reagan administration says it has no confidence in a treaty entered into by a Sandinista regime. It further insists that the Latin way of political envelopment, far from mellowing Managua, would merely let the regime consolidate power. Its call for contra aid follows.

The moral argument for contra aid—that it keeps faith with the democrats of Nicarauga—is powerful. They are worthy people, and they deserve better than to be identified, as some identify them, with that part of the Nicaraguan opposition consisting of Somoza holdovers.

The difficulty is the lack of a plausible way to help. The administration offers the contras. But in four years these forces have yet to demonstrate either military effectiveness—they have not held a town overnight—or political appeal—most leaders of the contra groups supported by Washington are Somoza holdovers and act the part. Senoir retired American military officers attest to the inadequacy of the administration's military program to accomplish any realistic military objectives. The prospect that American forces might have to bail out a failing contra expedition is real. The hostility to the United States that would grow elsewhere in Latin America is a serious consideration.

Four years of pursuit of democracy in Nicaragua by military means has spurred the Sandinistas to move faster toward police rule and has helped them gather wider Latin sympathy for being targets of American power. A more zealous application of this policy, as the administration urges, would not alter these unhappy basic facts.

Rather than contra aid, the Latins propose quickly to complete a treaty limiting Nicaragua's military reach and its Soviet-Cuban ties, and then to start trying to press the Sandinistas along a better internal path. It is argued that the security talks won't work without the pressure of the contras. The record suggests to us that those talks won't work with the pressure of the contras. The Sandinistas are in the eighth year of a communist revolution. Yet Nicaragua is contiguous to its Latin neighbors and connected to them in ways that Cuba never was. Its economy is in desperate straits.

The United States, moreover, would—should—remain ready to do what is necessary, in security policy, political support and development aid, to prevent Nicaragua from undermining the security of its Central American neighbors. It must also be ready to ensure, by its own military acts if necessary, that Nicaragua does not become a strategic threat to the United States.

Finally, the United States must not stop demanding that the Contadora Latins keep pressing the Sandinistas to open to the democrats in Nicaragua. The very least Americans can do for these Nicaraguans is to stay alert to ways of salvaging what can be salvaged by acceptable means.

DANIEL SHAPIRO TO COMPETE IN NATIONAL PTA CONTEST

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to bring to the attention of the Members of Congress the work of Daniel Shapiro. Danny, a student at Linglestown Junior High School, and a resident of Harrisburg, PA, has been chosen to be the sole representative from Pennsylvania in the national competition of the "PTA Reflections" competition that will take place in June.

Danny, an amateur photographer for just 1 year, entered the local PTA contest after learning of the competition through a school announcement. His photograph, in accordance with the contest's theme "On Liberty's View", reveals an interesting perspective of Pennsylvania's State Capitol in Harrisburg. He photographed, developed, and printed his entry, using the darkroom at the Museum of Scientific Discovery in Harrisburg.

After winning the competition at Linglestown Junior High School, he went on to capture first place in the intermediate competition and then took another first place in Statewide competition. I would like to congratulate Danny on his accomplishments and wish him the best of luck in the national competition.

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN HOY

HON. JOHN HILER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with this body a story about an individual who has touched a great many lives.

The very special person I am referring to is John Hoy, a man with a truly remarkable talent for making friends. Mr Hoy, a native of North Webster, IN, has dedicated himself to spreading friendship through the concept of "A Rose for Friendship."

I have been aware of Mr. Hoy's "mission of friendship" for a number of years, and I have always been impressed that one man could have such an effect on others' lives. In this fast-paced and complex modern day, it is reassuring to know that there are good friends like John Hoy among us.

I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an insightful newspaper article, which was written by Edith Gray, a resident of Goshen, IN.

[From the Mail-Journal (Milford and Syracuse, IN), Feb. 12, 1986]

"A ROSE FOR FRIENDSHIP"

On the shores of beautiful Tippecanoe Lake in northern Indiana in a lovely brick ranch home under great oak trees lives a sensitive man who many call friend. A native of the North Webster area, one-time milk salesman (in the days of home deliveries and the depression), now semi-retired realtor and developer, J.B. Hoy enjoys pursuing a dream he earnestly seeks to make come true.

In many ways he has already succeeded. But when his dream is finally realized, his part in achieving his goals will probably be forgotten by those who will enjoy the fruit of his labor.

In 1963 business took Mr. Hoy, the small-town businessman, to the big city of Chicago where he called on a gentleman in a luxurious office with lovely furnishings but with one flaw. On the receptionist's desk was a faded, plastic rose. After completing his business he left the office and returned a few minutes later with one long-stemmed rose which he presented to a delighted young lady in place of the artificial one. She sent a note of thanks to his home a few days later.

Three years later J.B.'s son, Phil Hoy, a personnel director for a firm in Fort Wayne, interviewed a young woman who had recently moved from Chicago. She inquired if he might be related to a J.B. Hoy of Tippecanoe Lake and was told of the relationship. She then related the long-stemmed rose incident and said she had always considered the rose to be the emblem of friendship and a compliment.

J.B. Hoy was impressed that one single act of kindness, long forgotten by him—it was such a little thing—that of giving a rose, had meant so much to another person that she would remember it three years afterward and even remember the stranger's name who had given it. The full impact of our human need for receiving expressions of kindness, love, or concern, that intangible thing we call friendship, hit home that day for J.B. Hoy. The more he thought about it, the more he appreciated his own friends and all the little things that many people had done for him over the years. It seemed that there should be some special way to repay and show appreciation for the many benefits of friendship he had received from others. But many of those acts of kindness had been done by people he could not identify, or the whereabouts of whom he no longer knew, or who were no longer living. So he felt a debt that seemed hopeless to repay.

The solution came in the form of a resolve that from that day forward each time he met someone, he would give that person a "rose" in the form of a compliment, a kind word, or an act of kindness.

As he carried out his resolve, he began to notice how many more acts of kindness were returned to him. Kind words begat kind words, compliments yielded a return compliment, days were brightened by the smiles and appreciative words received by the giver of a "rose." Truly, "a bit of fragrance always clings to the hand that gives a 'rose.'"

The value of friendship became even more apparent to J.B. Hoy upon the death of his wife, Eunice, of 37 years. He realized we have a day to honor almost every human relationship, Mother's Day, Father's Day, Valentine's Day for lovers, birthdays for ourselves, even Children's Day, but never has there been a day set aside to recognize one of the most precious possessions we have—our friends. No governmental unit had proclaimed a special day for expressing love and concern for others. Until J.B. Hoy took his dream to the 1976 session of the Indiana Legislature.

In February of that year the Legislature passed a little-publicized resolution designating the fourth week of June as "A Rose for Friendship Week" with the Wednesday of that week being "Friendship Day" and the then Governor Otis R. Bowen, M.D., now Director of the Department of Health and Human Services, so proclaimed it on April 2, 1976. As he did so, he mentioned to members of the press and J.B. Hoy ". . . carried to complete fulfillment, a Rose for Friendship could bring peace to all the world.

A resolution by the Legislature and the Proclamation by the Governor were two of the goals Mr. Hoy had set out to obtain. The third he has yet to achieve—to have a similar resolution passed by the Congress of the United States.

As I sat that day figuring my balance sheet, I was reminded of the Bible story of the rich man who built more barns to store the wheat to preserve his wealth in the form of farm production. Is it not more important to build more friendships? For fire or mold could destroy the wheat, thieves could come and steal it, or the bank could foreclose upon it. But building a balance sheet full of friends or with a few very good friends is something no one can take from you. Some of them may move away, but the friendship is still there. Its luster may tarnish with lack of use but with renewed communication the friendship becomes beautiful again just as a silver bowl with a little polish.

The exciting thing to me about J.B.'s concept of a "Rose for Friendship" is that it teaches us how to become a friend. Many people are friendless because they have never learned how to be a friend. When we give a "rose": that compliment, kind word, or act of kindness, we give of ourselves to others that precious commodity called love. And from that act, or many repetitions of it, can develop a beautiful friendship.

As a nation, at a time in our history when we are concerned with human rights and the welfare of people living in countries who do not share our concepts, what better way to demonstrate what we are trying to say about the value of the individual and the need for more acts of kindness in our world than to adopt a national day celebrating friendship—a Rose for Friendship Day. As Dr. Bowen said "a Rose for Friendship could bring peace to all the world." No nation in the history of the world has ever set aside a day to honor and recognize friendship. Shouldn't we, the United States of America, set the example? Isn't this an idea whose time has come?

Would it not be wonderful for us as a nation to send a compliment to other countries, including our enemies, on our national Rose for Friendship Day? Do a kind deed on that day for a neighboring country. Maybe the idea would catch on and we would learn to be better friends as nations of the world.

In addressing the Indiana assembly of lawmakers, J.B. Hoy said, "Rose is a key word, a symbol, for in the face of a rose the heart of God is revealed. In it you see love, tenderness, kindness, thoughtfulness. A rose is for friendship, for remembrance, for forgiveness. In its larger meaning, a Rose for Friendship can be an act of kindness, a token of remembrance, a compliment, or just a friendly word. In so doing, we lengthen our shadow, for kindness and thoughtfulness are watermarks of character."

A TRIBUTE TO HAL BOEL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the entire California delegation, I'd like to pay tribute to an individual who is well known and well respected by all of my colleagues in the California delegation—Hal Boel. Hal is retiring with 46 years of service for Pacific Telesis Group.

Most of us have known Hal as the "telephone company lobbyist" both in Washington recently, and for 10 years in Sacramento. Hal has been a familiar face in the California political scene—spreading good will on behalf of the k85,000 employees of Pacific Bell.

Hal's involvement in California related activities is well known. He has been a tireless supporter of the California State Society, the California Roundtable, and the Olympic fund-raising efforts. In addition, he is one of the first people my colleagues can call on to help with charitable or fund-raising efforts—Hal is always there: dependable, reliable, and helpful.

Hal has been a most effective representative of his corporation as well. Throughout his service with the telephone company, he has served in virtually every nonmanagement and management position.

While too numerous to cite in specifics, suffice to say Hal started as a lineman in Nevada in 1942 building a redundant telephone route through Nevada. He was promoted to service representative, worked as a manager in Fresno, Bakersfield, Modesto, San Francisco, and Marysville. He entered the political arena in 1967 as Pacific's lobbyist in Sacramento, and capped his career as vice president, Federal relations when the company opened its door in Washington 3 years ago.

Hal served this country well as a Navy pilot during World War II. In addition, he participated in the Executive Program at the University of California.

Hal is also a family man. He loves to spend his time hunting and fishing with his sons Neil and Mark—or in Tahoe and on the golf course with daughters Stephanie and Nan. He and his wife Jan are looking forward to settling back in California—and allocating more time to those things he loves.

Mr. Speaker, Hal Boel will be sorely missed as an active and effective participant in the California political scene. I, along with my colleagues, consider Hal a trusted lobbyist and a good friend. I know I speak for the entire delegation in wishing him the best of luck.

JUSTICE FOR MURDER VICTIMS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, following the approval by this House yesterday of changes to the Victims of Crime Act of 1984, it is most appropriate that I draw your attention and the attention of my colleagues in the Congress to a special organization in my district called "Justice for Murder Victims." I first came into contact with this group through one of the members of my congressional office staff who is, through tragic circumstances, a victim of crime herself.

The purpose of this organization is to provide assistance to victims of crime and their families regardless of race, color, religion, or social status. The people who volunteer their help have themselves been targets of crime, and they well understand the feelings of pain, anger, fear, and isolation experienced by survivors of violent attacks.

The idea stems from the San Francisco Chapter of Parents of Murdered Children which was founded in 1979. Six years later, Justice for Murder Victims was organized and incorporated. Members offer assistance in the form of personal counseling, advising survivors of programs available to help them lead normal lives again, help in receiving benefits to which they may be entitled, and familiarizing them with the complicated and often confusing judicial procedure which they experience. The aim of the organization is to ensure that laws already enacted are enforced and to work within the legislative process to secure new legislation which will bring added protection for all Americans.

A group such as this is long overdue. For too long, victims of criminal attack have been neglected as we have focused attention upon the criminal. For example, criminal suspects are entitled to free legal assistance and unlimited medical care, but the victim of a crime has only minimal benefits. "Justice for Murder Victims" has taken the first important step toward rectifying these inequalities. It deserves the support of all of us, for all of us are potential victims of crime through no action or fault of our own.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to pay my own special tribute to Elizabeth and Sven Carlson, whom I have known for many years. I admire them not only for their courage, but also for their commitment and dedication to helping fellow victims of crime. My heart goes out to them as they continue their work. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, and my fellow colleagues in Congress, to join with me in saluting this much needed organization.

VALIANT EFFORTS SAVE LIFE OF 3-YEAR-OLD CHILD

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI,

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to pay tribute to a very special group of concerned medical and police personnel in my congressional district through whose valiant and sustained efforts the life of a trapped and drowning 3-year-old girl was saved. This remarkable group showed through example just what can be accomplished when dedicated people work to turn an almost certain tragedy into a story of inspiration.

On the night of April 9, 1986, a car plunged into the frigid waters off Stapleton, Staten Island and 3-year-old Jacqueline Williams was trapped inside. Alerted to the emergency, members of the Emergency Medical Service and the police department quickly arrived on the scene. Their efforts to pull the child from the car were thwarted by the cold water and the high waves. By the time the child was pulled from the car by police divers she had been trapped under water for 25 minutes. At that point, Mr. Speaker, the girl's heart was not beating and she was not breathing—clinically, she was dead.

Undeterred, the EMS specialists immediately went to work administering CPR on the child while she was placed in an ambulance and taken to Bayley Seton Hospital. At Bayley Seton Hospital, a devoted team of doctors and nurses went into action working relentlessly until Jacqueline's heartbeat and breathing were restored. Once stabilized, the child was transferred to a special pediatrics unit at St. Vincent's Medical Center.

Mr. Speaker, what these exceptional people did was in no way short of a miracle. Without their dedication, concern and hope, Jacqueline Williams would not be alive today. It is for this reason that I would like to enter their names here as a record of their dedication and service.

Members of the Emergency Medical Service who assisted include Ralph Wainwright, Charles Pfefferbaum, Nicholas Catello, Rod Mauceri, Christopher Schwartz, Ray Tufaro, and William Azar. Gary Brennan and Michael Duchin, members of the Staten Island ambulance crew, also gave their services.

Those helping from the police department were Sgt. Salvatore Margarella and Police Officers Robert Higgins, Frank Hamer, George Croake, Ernest Couch, Vincent Fucci, Michael Careu, and Kevin Collins.

Finally, the fine team from Bayley Seton Hospital included Dr. Lloyd McPherson, Dr. Alberto Belalcazar, Eileen Schierenbeck, Helen Mohon, Bruce Cornish, Maria Sineri, Janet Madoro, Alice Porowski, and Franklin Rosado.

Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to bring the outstanding accomplishments of these modern heroes—and indeed they are heroes—to the attention of my colleagues in the House. I know that they join me in applauding the valiant service that led to the saving of a young child's life.

FAIR SHARE LOW-INCOME ENERGY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1986

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4556, the Fair Share Low-Income Energy Assistance Act of 1986. This bill ensures that Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program funds are distributed among States in a fair manner. The LIHEAP Program distributes funds to low-income families in order to help them pay home energy bills.

The Gramm-Rudman Balanced Budget Act has put our country back on the path to fiscal health. I fully support Gramm-Rudman, and believe that the Congress can stick to the deficit reduction schedule in the law if it exercises strong leadership and a sense of fairness. Across-the-board spending reductions are one way that the Congress can demonstrate this sense of fairness.

However, this sense of fairness is threatened by certain loopholes that impose unfair shares of budget reductions on some States. The uneven budget reductions that are proposed in the LIHEAP Program are evidence of unfairness in our common fight for the fiscal health of our great country. Currently, a hold-harmless provision protects certain States from Gramm-Rudman reductions in the program, although the law provided that the program must be cut by 4.3 percent in fiscal year 1986. In order to comply with these reductions and respect the hold-harmless clause those States that do not enjoy this special protection have to shoulder an unfair share of budget reductions. My home State of Texas is one of the States that would have to bear an unfair share of future budget reductions. The LIHEAP allocations for Texas and 14 other States will suffer 11.4 percent reductions in order to achieve an across-the-board reduction of 4.3 percent.

The Department of Health and Human Services has announced that reductions in the LIHEAP Program will range from 0 percent to 4.3 percent to 11.4 percent. I believe that the wide range in these reductions is an example of the unfairness that will spoil congressional efforts to control Federal spending and reduce the deficit. The Members from the unlucky States that shoulder an unfair share of reductions in this program will push for special consideration in other areas.

The Fair Share Low-Income Energy Assistance Act of 1986 presents us with the opportunity to retain the sense of fairness that is essential to our duty to balance the budget and comply with the provisions of Gramm-Rudman. Under H.R. 4556, reductions in the LIHEAP Program will be made on a pro rata basis in every State. Under the bill, the States will shoulder the same reduction, and there would be no favorites. I believe that Congress must maintain a sense of fairness on budget reductions if we are to succeed in our difficult task.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4556 and the effort to establish fair standards for reductions in the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program.

RESPONSIBILITY

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, today, millions of taxpayers across the United States are hustling to meet the April 15th income tax filing deadline. Meeting this deadline, or at least filing for an extension of time to file, is expected of all responsible U.S. taxpayers.

The important point here is that we expect the taxpaying public to act responsibly in handling their affairs, yet the same expectations do not seem to apply to many of the actions of this body.

Today, Mr. Speaker, also marks another deadline important to the livelihood of U.S. taxpayers. The Congress, in accordance with Federal law, was to have come up with a budget resolution for fiscal year 1987 by April 15. Regrettably, such action is not yet complete.

The Members of the other body have lived up to their end of this congressional commitment. However, the House Democratic leadership has done little, other than playing partisan politics with the administration budget proposals, to move this body toward action on a budget resolution.

I guess it's a good thing that there aren't agents like those of the IRS to enforce our budgetary commitments, Mr. Speaker, because their hands would be full in this institution.

The sequestration process of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 will be upon us, if we allow the budget process to falter in this manner. That will clearly mark the leadership of the majority in this House as irresponsible. We must act on a budget resolution without further delay.

On behalf of taxpayers throughout the Nation, I urge my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to consider the seriousness of this situation and the ridicule to which you will be subject, and to allow the membership of this body an opportunity to vote on a budget.

Today, millions of taxpayers are living up to their obligations under the U.S. Internal Revenue Code. Don't we owe it to these responsible citizens to live up to our obligations and responsibilities as their representatives?

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO DR. MARION L. PLIES

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Dr. Marion LaVona Plies, who will be celebrating the 45th year of her pastorate at the Harbor City Foursquare Church in Harbor City, CA, on April 27, 1986.

Born in Fort Worth, TX, in 1910, Dr. Plies and her family moved to San Francisco, CA, when she was 7 years old. Her family later moved to Los Angeles, CA, where Dr. Plies attended Huntington Park Union High School by day, and LIFE Bible College at night. In January of 1930, she graduated from LIFE Bible College. She had married George Plies in 1929, and following her graduation she worked with a number of ministers and ran a mission on San Pedro Street.

After a number of years, she was asked to take over the pastorate at the Harbor City Foursquare Church. She officially took over the pastorate in 1941. In September of 1948, Dr. Plies opened the Harbor City Christian School. The school has been relocated since to a new site, and has opened up a high school. The church itself has been relocated, and in all, Dr. Plies has been responsible for the acquisition, on behalf of the church, of over $5.7 million worth of developed property.

In addition to her outstanding work with the Harbor City Foursquare Church, and the Harbor City Christian School, Dr. Plies has been a leader in a number of other areas of Christian work. Dr. Plies has served on the International Education Committee of the International Church of Foursquare Gospel, and is the founder of the Foursquare Association of Christian Schools. She is also the author of a book entitled, "To God Be the Glory," and the recipient of an honorary doctorate for her work in Pentecostal Christian Day Schools.

It is with great pride that my wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Dr. Plies on her 45th year as the pastor of the Harbor City Foursquare Church, and in wishing Dr. Marion L. Plies, her son Vic and his wife Mary—continued success, and all the best in the years ahead.

SUPPORT PRESIDENT REAGAN MILITARY ACTION VERSUS LIBYA

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to convey my support for the President's decision of last night to launch a limited but purposeful military attack on selected targets in two cities in Libya. I believe the response was entirely appropriate considering the repeated patterns of provocations by Libyan leader Qadhafi including "irrefutable" evidence linking Libya to the West German club bombing which killed an American soldier.

It is obvious that Qadhafi poses a menace to the United States and to the free world. It is obvious that Qadhafi feels he could operate his reign of terror with impunity and without fear of response. Such an assumption on his part was wrong.

The use of military force is justified by the United States when it is operating as in last night's action in self-defense. Unlike Libyan terrorism which seeks out innocent civilians for its victims, every effort was made in the United States mission to minimize damage and harm to civilians.

A total of 33 United States F–111's and A6 and A7 attack planes were involved in last night's action. We pray for the recovery of the one missing F–111 and its two-member crew. We commend the skill and bravery of our Armed Forces in conducting this action so successfully. The message that was sent to Libya had to be sent. It was a message their leader asked for and got.

JAMES G. McCANN, DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEEMAN

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Mr. James G. McCann, for more than a half century of loyal service to the Philadelphia Democratic Party.

Mr. McCann has been a Democratic Party committeeman in 33d ward, 13th division, since shortly after he graduated from high school. In that time he has helped his party rise in power and influence in city government and he has seen Philadelphia grow and renew itself. The 33d ward, including parts of Kensington and Juniata, has been a stronghold for the Democratic Party, due in no small part to the dedicated efforts of people like Jim McCann. These people have helped maintain a 3-to-1 voter registration edge and a strong and effective party organization.

Mr. McCann is a lifelong Philadelphian, and a graduate of North Catholic HIgh School. He worked for over 20 years at Liberty Bell Racetrack and in the city's department of revenue. He and his wife Dorothy have raised 5 children and are now proud grandparents to 15 grandchildren and 1 great-grandchild.

Jim McCann stands for what is best in our political system, and for what is best in our party. He has set an example through a lifetime of service and dedication that should be an inspiration to all of us. I am happy to join with the Democrats of the 33d ward and throughout Philadelphia in saluting James McCann as he leaves the 13th division to enjoy a well-deserved retirement from our party's activities.

NEO-PROTECTIONISM

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention to a recent article, "Neo-Protectionism, a Growing Threat to World Trade," by Charles R. Allen, executive vice president and chief executive officer TRW, Inc. The article appeared in the February addition of the Financial Executives Institute publication FE. Mr. Allens' article points out why protectionism is a self-defeating approach for the U.S. trade deficit.

As the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee in the House of Representatives, I find the growing call for protectionism alarming. Traditionally, the United States has always supported free trade with other nations and it is only recently, in the light of growing U.S. trade deficits, that the trend toward protectionism is spreading.

One of the best historical examples of the failure of trade protection is the Smoot-Hawley Act, implemented by President Hoover to protect trade in the late 1920's. Instead of developing a strategy to improve the competitive capabilities of American goods and continuing the tax reductions begun by President Coolidge, Hoover isolated the United States with trade protection and tariffs. Once implemented, Smoot-Hawley was met with retaliation by other nations who reacted by raising their import tariffs against U.S. products. High trade tariffs worldwide caused an international slump in trade. The United States, unable to meet the high cost of exporting goods to foreign countries, decreased production resulting in higher unemployment. It is clear that the Smoot-Hawley Act only aggravated the Depression and did not accomplish its goal of protecting U.S. goods and creating employment opportunities.

Today the United States is faced with a similar fate. If we pursue the course of protectionism and isolation we will lose the vitality and innovation of our domestic economy. Protectionism only locks industry and labor into inefficient methods which stifle modernization and the response to changing technology and consumer demands.

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, I urge you to read Mr. Allen's article and consider the effects that protectionism will have on our future. We do not want to repeat the same mistakes of our past.

NEO-PROTECTIONISM A GROWING THREAT TO WORLD TRADE

(By Charles R. Allen)

The major trading countries must get serious—very soon—about supporting an open, fair, and expanding world trade system, or suffer the consequences of their inaction.

The drive for open trade is a constant struggle between long-term universal values and short-term, narrow nationalistic fears, distress, or simple greed. It's like the nuclear peace that we all so desire, yet find so hard to achieve because of human frailty. And though the problem is coming to a head in the U.S., the solution is one that must involve the whole trading community.

Let's start with a look at some recent developments in the United States. Beginning late last spring, the U.S. Congress has been caught up in a legislative frenzy. More than 300 specific trade measures have been introduced: trade protection bills, trade expansion bills, and trade reform bills. The underlying theme of many of these bills is labeled as "fair trade" but is, in fact, an appeal to some form of protectionism.

Of all the private interest groups in the U.S., the large multinational companies are almost alone in trying to slow a runaway protectionist freight train speeding toward disaster. Most labor unions and trade associations are urging it on with all their energy. Small businessmen, farmers, and industries most affected by growing imports are lobbying furiously, as they sense a growing protectionist sentiment throughout the country. The trade deficit is looming as a major issue in the 1986 Congressional campaign.

This protectionist thrust must be stopped before it has gone too far. Preventive action is needed, not just by the United States, but also by all the major trading nations. All of them should be as concerned as we to avoid a trade war, for many have even more to lose. What a trade war would do to the debt-laden economies of Latin America, not to mention the world banking and credit systems, is too awful to contemplate.

We must all understand that the economic and political posture of the United States in the world community is in a process of change.

For the first time in memory, the U.S. standard of living is going down, both in absolute terms and compared with other countries. The telling evidence of the U.S. decline appears in our balance of trade. We have changed almost overnight from a net exporter, running trade surpluses with the rest of the world, to a net importer with huge negative trade balances in merchandise, as much as $150 billion in 1985.

The trade deficit has led to large-scale job displacement and industrial unemployment, upheavals in major industries and communities, and a depression in U.S. agriculture, with epidemic bankruptcy in small family farms, low commodity prices, and loss of export markets.

U.S. government policies have been slow to respond to changes in trading patterns, and now we face a serious problem of orderly adjustment. The result is intense—perhaps irresistible—pressure on politicians to protect U.S. industry and agriculture.

The causes of the U.S. decline most often mentioned include:

First, the loss of competitive advantage to a number of emerging industrial powers that have outperformed us in the excellence of their marketing strategies, products, quality, and productivity. This is probably the major problem we face. Responsible business leaders in the U.S. have come at last to realize that competing for global markets is a matter of some urgency, even survival.

Next is the too-huge U.S. budget deficit, which begins a vicious cycle leading to higher interest rates, which, in turn attracts foreign investors to U.S. government securities. This flow of funds then drives up the value of the dollar, making our exports uncompetitive and whetting consumer appetites for imports. Most of us were taught that trade imbalances were self-correcting; a country's worsening trade deficit would weaken its currency. So much for conventional wisdom. For in today's environment of global interdependence, it is capital flows, not trade flows, that produce an overvalued dollar, all made possible by the emergence of international money and capital markets. While one can applaud the efforts of the Group of Five (Japan, England, U.S., Germany, and France) to lower the value of the dollar, intervention in the currency markets cannot produce lasting effects. The ultimate solution to the overvalued dollar is to be found only in reduced budget deficits.

Third, we should not be surprised by the sharp decline of U.S. exports to countries, particularly in Latin America, burdened with foreign debt.

Finally, there has been a slow but steady increase in restrictive and aggressive trade practices that are nullifying past efforts to promote expanding world trade through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and other multilateral negotiations. I refer to such well-known practices as:

Rebates of European value-added taxes on export items, creating a competitive cost advantage.

Quotas against selected products, designed to protect the domestic producers. So-called voluntary agreements are much in vogue. In the U.S., limitations on imports of Japanese cars and limitations on imports of European steel are prime examples.

Bureaucratic barriers to unwanted imports—harrassing inspections, absurd product standards, unwarranted paperwork—all justified as national prerogatives, and evasions of past commitments.

Aggressive government-aided strategies, including direct export subsidies, subsidized shipping, insurance, and financing arrangements that virtually insure exporters against risk.

The list goes on. Whatever the strategies used, no country can claim that it always plays fair. We are all sinners, some more than others. But right or wrong, it is perceived in Washington that the U.S. is a net loser in the game of restrictive trade practices. And while such actions may account for only a small part of the U.S. trade deficit, they lend moral support to the argument of our protectionists. Like the small tail wagging a big dog, they are an irritant that arouses a disproportionate reaction in Congress.

One cannot review the U.S. trade deficit without noting the special role of Japan. Certainly the powerful economic advance of Japan is an important cause of the world trade imbalance and the drift toward protectionism. Still, the popular and long-standing pastime of blaming Japan for all our problems is overdone and counterproductive, as it leads to negative rather than positive solutions.

I mention "long-standing" because of an astonishing prophecy, made 35 years ago, by Joseph Stalin. He predicted that one day the Western Alliance, no longer able to absorb the export capabilities of Japan, would fall apart in a naked struggle for markets. There was just enough truth in that prediction to make one stop and think.

Today, both Europe and the United States are suffering from the combination of massive Japanese exports and exclusionary practices against imports. Our growing deficit with Japan alone—$19 billion in 1983, $38 billion, in 1984, $50 billion-plus in 1985—shows no signs of turning around.

There's considerable feeling, justified or not, that Japanese industry and government have been ganging up on us in ways that we are not permitted to use under our rules of fair play. There is anger not only about Japan's aggressive assault on our markets, but also about what's seen as extreme resistance to our exports to Japan, even where we have a decided advantage in cost or technology.

In fairness, there is much truth to the countercharge that many U.S. firms have not been very effective in marketing their products in Japan. However, it's clear that the recent surge of trade bills in the Congress was triggered largely by frustration over the failure of trade negotiations to gain improved acceptance of U.S. telecommunications equipment. In contrast, the breakup of AT&T enabled a major Japanese invasion of our domestic telecommunications market.

By now, that militancy is being directed not just toward Japan and other Far Eastern countries but toward some of our trading partners in Europe and Latin America as well.

I mentioned earlier the fundamental change that has altered the U.S. economic posture in the world community. In days past, the U.S. has been viewed as an invulnerable economic giant. That may once have been true, but it doesn't look that way to us now. We look east to the European Community, an economy at least as large, modern, and advanced in technology as ours. We look south to the state-of-the-art factories and low wages of Mexico and Brazil, and west across the Pacific to the new industrial revolution launched by Japan and joined by Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore.

And we begin to realize that those comfortable days in which U.S. firms competed mainly with each other in a market that all understood, under accepted rules of the game, are gone forever.

Gone, too, are the days when the unchallenged might of U.S. mass production bought the machinery that enabled us to pay the world's highest wages and still enjoy the world's lowest unit labor costs. Now, for the first time, we face tough foreign competition in a world market, under terms that we do not control. To some of our competitors, the only rule seems to be "export or die."

Since the end of World War II, it's fair to say the U.S. has been a strong advocate of trade liberalization and open markets. For motives both selfish and broad-gauged, it has fostered common markets in Europe, Asia, and Latin America, and supported a stronger GATT and healthy private-enterprise economies in Japan and throughout the free world.

Following the war, it was not difficult for the U.S., as the world's dominant economic power, to open its gates to foreign imports, to help allies by trade, not aid. Those efforts helped create not only an explosion of world trade and growing wealth but also the emergence of two new economic superstars—Japan and the European Community. The fact that some European nations still see themselves as separate national economic units does not alter the reality of the combined economic power of the European trading bloc.

The world responsibilities of a great industrial power have not changed from 1950, when there was one, to today, when there are three—the U.S., Europe, and Japan.

A country in a position of having a profound impact on the world economy has two choices:

To deal positively with problems created by its successes, assume its full share of the task of leadership, and moderate the demands of its constituencies; or

To continue to seek maximum advantage for narrow national interests until overwhelming opposition and hostility arise and destroy the fragile web of economic cooperation.

What seems to be happening today is that Western Europe is seeking to protect itself against U.S. and Japanese exports, and evasions of the intent of the GATT have been increasing, both in number and ingenuity. Meanwhile, Japan continues to exclude U.S. and European exports, and to step up its assault upon foreign markets.

U.S. leaders are led to conclude that we can no longer carry the main responsibility for open markets, that the time has come for others to bear an equal burden in supporting trade. Those are the realities of the present trade environment. Because the seductions of protectionism are ever present, politically tempting, and easy to rationalize, the situation is dangerous. The step from where we are now to serious protectionism is a short one.

Let me stress that the real and official U.S. position is still strongly pro-free trade. The President, as a committed free trader, but a political pragnatist as well, is trying to avoid a hard confrontation with Congress and the protectionist lobby, where a defeat on any one trade bill could unleash an avalanche. He has warned that the United States—while shunning protectionism—will insist upon full parity of treatment for its exports, the same as that granted by the U.S. to imports in its home markets, asserting that there can be "no free trade that is not fair," Those words should be taken seriously.

As financial executives, we know that when business competes against on equal terms under an orderly set of rules, the market can be trusted to diffuse power, and comparative advantage can work its begin magic to the benefit of all. But when societies and governments compete, cut deals, each seeking the greatest national advantage, we have a prescription for economic war.

To sum up: The time has come when all industrially advanced nations will have to make significant changes in order to maintain a world trade environment in which we all can live and prosper together. The United States is under greater pressure to deal with its domestic economic problems and to compete more effectively in the world without falling prey to protectionism. The major trading nations are under equal pressure to recognize that the era of the United States playing big brother to the free world economy has been brought to an end by inexorable forces of history and economics.

Looking at the present situation, there are a range of possible outcomes.

One is that key trading nations will evade their leadership responsibilities to the international community and will insist upon playing by their own rules. The next round of GATT negotiations will fizzle. A firmer response by the United States to what it views as unfair trade practices will meet with hostility and retaliation. The European Economic Community will break out in internal bickering and advantage seeking. Japan will keep talking and keep shipping. And all together, we will pull the roof down upon ourselves.

That dreary outcome is the worst-case scenario and, though unlikely, it's by no means impossible.

A far happier outcome results if all the major trading nations can agree that a strong and open world trade system should be a primary goal of every national policy and approach the next GATT negotiations in that spirit. In seeking such a positive outcome, there is a special role for the international business community.

Business knows what is at stake. It will be the first to suffer if the trade system is blown apart. Business has the resources and the credibility to encourage our governments to do what they must do to avoid a fight that no one can win.

And we, as financial executives, are in a special position to appreciate the benefits of world trade and fear the perils of protectionism. Today, the world trade system is in danger. It must be preserved and strengthened at all costs. Such are the dues every nation must pay for sharing in the benefits of a world economy. For to help that economy survive and grow, we must all truly support open markets and fair competition.

TRIBUTE TO BROCKTON HOSPITAL SCHOOL OF NURSING

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to rise today in recognition of the Brockton Hospital School of Nursing. The Brockton Hospital School of Nursing, founded in 1897, is celebrating 90 years of excellent service to the Greater Brockton Metropolitan Community. It is the only hospital-based school within the area that offers its students field training while simultaneously setting high standards of nursing education with a curriculum based on both the humanities and health and nursing. The students receive a wide variety of educational benefits through their learning experience. As a result, 90 percent of the graduating students pass their RN qualifying examinations on the first attempt.

The school is a private nonprofit institution that is funded directly through the Brockton Hospital and the Federal Government through Medicare grants. Students who enroll in the Brockton Hospital School of Nursing may also receive additional assistance in meeting the costs of tuition through the many financial programs offered by the Federal Government. The school of nursing enjoys full accreditation while its student enjoy small classroom settings with excellent facilities.

Recently, the Brockton Hospital School of Nursing has collaborated with Stonehill College, a 4-year accredited liberal arts college located in North Easton, MA. Students who graduate from the nursing school in high standing, may now continue on with their studies at Stonehill, receiving their baccalaureate in nursing.

On behalf of the citizens of Massachusetts, I wish to congratulate the Brockton Hospital School of Nursing for its 90 years of dedicated service to the Brockton metropolitan community.

HOW NATURAL GAS USE CAN REDUCE ACID RAIN

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Mulroney in their recent Washington summit issued a statement that acid rain is a common environmental problem for both countries, and recommended a coal technology program as the answer to acid rain. Last week, legislation was introduced in the House that would establish an expensive control program to reduce the sulfate emissions that some say are the source of acid deposition.

I believe that a very important means of sulfate emissions reduction has been overlooked: the select use of natural gas. The select use of natural gas is probably the most painless way to reduce sulfate emissions. As such, it is an appropriate approach to an acid rain control program.

Natural gas is the cleanest burning fossil fuel, producing virtually no sulfur oxides or particulate matter, and only a small fraction of the nitrogen oxides produced by coal or high sulfur residual fuel oil. Natural gas could substitute for coal or high-sulfur fuel oil in some circumstances. A partial substitution of natural gas for coal would also minimize the impact on local coal industries compared to other alternatives such as coal switching.

One of the most attractive features of increased use of natural gas for environmental purposes is its low cost. Natural gas is a very cost-effective fuel for electric generation, and because of its clean burning characteristics its operation and maintenance costs are much lower than other fuels. The low cost of sulfur dioxide removed should be compared with other control methods. Natural gas use with coal or oil can remove sulfur dioxide at costs of $200 to $400 per ton removed. In comparision, control technology such as "scrubbers" can cost as much as $2,000 per ton of sulfur dioxide removed.

In new plants, the cost advantage of select use of natural gas is even more marked. A new combined-cycle gas turbine powerplant can be installed at a capital cost of $500 per kilowatt, about one-third the cost of a new coal-fired unit. Further, a natural gas plant will produce less than 0.003 percent of the sulfur dioxide produced by a comparable coal powerplant with pollution control technology. Gas has advantages based on both cost and environmental factors.

Natural gas is both cheap and plentiful, and an increased demand for gas for environmental purposes would shrink the "bubble" that troubles natural gas producers. Gas supplies far exceed current demand. An increase in gas use of 1 trillion cubic feet, about 6 percent of consumption, would decrease annual sulfate emissions by 2 to 3 million tons. This would be a very substantial reduction, especially in the context of a 5 million ton reduction program such as proposed by President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney.

Incredibly, the United States discourages the use of natural gas through certain regulations and provisions of law. These regulations and laws were added at a time when natural gas supplies had been eroded through Government price controls and supplies were scarce. However, these natural gas-shortages have disappeared since the partial decontrol of gas, and supplies are ample. The legal impediments to select use of natural gas, such as the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act and incremental pricing provisions of the 1978 Natural Gas Policy Act, must be repealed. Repeal of these restrictive provisions can enable industrial customers and utilities to use more natural gas.

There is legislation before Congress to repeal the Fuel Use Act and the incremental pricing provisions of the Natural Gas Policy Act. I encourage my House colleagues to seriously consider supporting this legislation.

I have not been convinced that acid deposition is a serious environmental problem that deserves an expensive control program. However, I have outlined some of the benefits of select use of natural gas for my House colleagues who support an acid rain control program. Gas has clear environmental benefits.

THE ISSUE OF EMPLOYER SANCTIONS AND IMPLEMENTATION UNDER IMMIGRATION REFORM BILLS

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House a statement by Richard L. Lesher of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce which addresses the issue of employer sanctions and their implementation under the immigration reform bills presently under consideration by the House. I believe his statement suggests an alternative that would make such legislation much more palatable to business interests while at the same time maintaining the kind of protection necessary for enforcement purposes.

Mr. Lesher's statement follows:

It's a tribute to America that while around the world people literally are dying to get out of countries limiting freedom and opportunity, they're falling all over each other to get in here.

But the ability of an estimated 3 million to 6 million foreigners to reside illegally within our borders weakens the very system that attracts them.

America's freedoms are based on our system of laws. We cannot allow these laws to be broken with impunity during nearly two million border crossings every day, nor can we encourage creating an entire class of people whose very presence mocks those laws.

We must prevent this destabilization. The question is how. Congress has struggled with that one for ages, in part because they've been unable to resist making business the fall guy.

Immigration control proposals over the years have invariably included sanctions against employers who hire illegals. Now no one wants to protect employers who knowingly hire illegals. But most sanction proposals have included onerous record-keeping requirements and criminal penalties against employers who may have been duped into hiring illegals—provisions bound to cause employers to avoid hiring Hispanics, not out of discriminatory intent but out of self-defense.

Fortunately, Sen. ALAN SIMPSON, R-Wyo., this year introduced reform legislation with less burdensome—and optional—record-keeping requirements and no criminal sanctions. Limited criminal sanctions were added in committee but Simpson's bill remains a tough and fair attempt to regain control of our borders—one business can live with.

But the House of Representatives seems determined to hang the immigration control millstone around business' neck. Legislation introduced by Rep. PETER RODINO, D-N.J., takes those onerous record-keeping requirements off the trash heap and puts them back on the table—and imposes criminal penalties for mere paperwork violations.

Congress would do well to enact legislation closer to the Simpson version. It isn't perfect, but unlike Rodino's bill, it represents a fair compromise. However, Congress would do even better to go beyond these limited efforts to address the full range of issues surrounding immigration control.

Maybe we could take a hint from that old saying "If you can't bring Mohammed to the mountain, bring the mountain to Mohammed" by addressing the desperate political and economic straits illegal immigrants are fleeing. And I'm not talking about foreign aid giveaways. We should be in the position of providing the fishing poles and the lessons, not the fish.

We should establish free trade zones with our neighbors and encourage them to copy our recent tax and budget cuts and regulatory reforms—policies based on a return to the freedoms that historically have produced unprecedented prosperity.

Instead of importing foreign workers, perhaps the best solution is to export the best features of the system that attracts foreigners to our shores in the first place.

Mr. Speaker, the sentiments expressed by Mr. Lesher should provide ample food for thought as we address the critical issue of immigration control. Certainly there is not enough room for all who would like to come to the United States and our efforts should realize the burdens that American businesses already bear.

EAGLE SCOUT AWARD TO MARC DORMAN

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this time to express my congratulations to Marc Dorman of Harrisburg, PA, who will receive the Boy Scout Eagle Award on Monday, April 21, 1986. This event is always a special time for the family and friends of a man who receives such an award because it is a recognition of his dedication to his community and country.

Marc, a freshman honor student at Susquehanna Township Senior High School, is a member of Boy Scout Troop 256. He began the scouting program as a Cub Scout in Troop 38 and has worked his way through Webelos and Boy Scouts. At Susquehanna High School he is the freshman class president, a member of the baseball team, and a violinist in the school orchestra.

As part of the scouting program, Marc is involved with the Medical Explorer Post at Polyclinic Medical Center in Harrisburg. Since joining Troop 256 he has served as a patrol leader, chaplain's aid, and quartermaster. He is also an ordeal member of the Order of the Arrow.

Marc Dorman has shown excellent service and leadership capabilities in his work with the Scouts and should be congratulated for earning this very distinguished achievement. I wish him good luck and great success in his future endeavors.

CONGRESS SHOULD START MEETING ITS DEADLINES

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, is today just the first of a series of deadlines this House will miss under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Reduction Act of 1985?

Congress was to have completed action on a binding budget resolution for fiscal year 1987 by today. The majority side of the House Budget Committee has not even produced such a resolution to date.

Before we know it, June 10, the deadline for all appropriations bills to be through the Appropriations Committee, will be past. Then June 15, when the Congress is to have completed action on budget reconciliation, will be gone. June 30, when all appropriations bills are to have cleared the House, may slip by. If we miss those last deadlines, we may miss an extended Independence Day district work period, because technically we cannot adjourn for more than 3 days until we have cleared all reconciliation and appropriations legislation.

The purpose of the accelerated deadlines for consideration of budget legislation this year was to insure that everything was done by mid-August, when the economic agencies are to take the economic snapshot that will show whether we are within the required deficit reduction target and can avoid sequestration on necessary programs.

Every deadline we miss brings us closer to the sequestration we wish to avoid. Let us start meeting the deadlines instead of ignoring them.

A SPECIAL TRIBUTE TO DR. H. CLAUDE HUDSON

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1986, the distinguished son of a former slave and Louisiana sharecropper, Dr. H. Claude Hudson, shares his 100th anniversary with four generations of relatives, community associates, and friends from all walks of life.

The phenomenal career of this libertarian, successful dentist, civil rights leader, and president of a $50 million savings and loan institution exemplifies the finest tradition of American life.

Dr. Hudson was elected to the presidency of the Shreveport, LA, branch of the NAACP in 1921 at a time when being president of the NAACP in the South was not only unfashionable, but suicidal. Whenever referring to his membership in the NAACP, he identified it as a citizens' committee. He was so active in fighting segregation and police abuses that in June 1923 he was "called on the carpet" by the power structure. Immediately, he went to the office of the chief of police and found him with the sheriff discussing what to do with Dr. Hudson. Dr. Hudson argued the situtation with them and they finally admonished him to, "Go home, be a good boy, and don't give us any more trouble."

That visit to the chief of police and sheriff saved his life. Having already obtained a license to practice dentistry in California, he moved his family to Los Angeles without causing further disturbance. That incident gave rise to the rumor that he had been run out of Shreveport. He never denied it because it was a good story and gave everyone who heard it a good laugh.

In November 1924, due to this record of service during his 2 years with the Shreveport branch of the NAACP, he was elected to the presidency of the Los Angeles branch. Even though he had changed his residency, he didn't miss a year of service with the NAACP.

During his second term as president of the Los Angeles branch, Dr. Hudson faced a serious civil rights problem. At this time the Pacific Ocean was segregated: Black people, with one minor exception, could not go to the beach without being molested. So in 1925, he and seven other members of the NAACP waded in the ocean at Manhattan Beach, were arrested and fined $500 for defying the no-swimming ordinance. He immediately appealed the decision, and thereupon the Manhattan Beach court called him in and wanted to throw the case out of court. He agreed, but asked what was going to be done about the parking ordinance which allowed only 15 minutes for bathers to undress, swim, and return to their cars. The court reminded him that it would take about 90 days to repeal the ordinance. Dr. Hudson informed him that he was aware of that, as well as the fact that the ordinance was not being enforced against anyone else. The court responded that if he dropped the case they would not enforce the ordinance against black people. On the following day Dr. Hudson took a little black boy with him to swim on the beach to see if they would be arrested, but they were not and from that day on the beaches have been open to everyone.

Dr. Hudson served 10 consecutive years as president of the NAACP Los Angeles branch, which he developed into one of the largest and most effective in the Nation. Since 1934, Dr. Hudson has served the local branch as either vice president or as a member of the executive board. In 1950, he was elected to the national board of directors of the NAACP and has served continuously since that date. He is at present a member of the executive committee of the national board of directors.

In 1927, Dr. Hudson enrolled in the Loyola University School of Law and was awarded the LL.B. degree in 1931. His interest in the study of law was to broaden his education to better enable him to carry on the work of the civil rights organization.

Dr. Hudson assumed the presidency of Broadway Federal Savings & Loan Association in 1949 when the association had assets of less than $3 million. The association, with Dr. Hudson as its leader, broke the stranglehold of white savings and loan associations in Los Angeles, who refused to lend money on property located in neighborhoods where they felt black people should not live. Broadway made so many loans until the white associations reversed their position and began making loans to people under better terms.

Under Dr. Hudson's leadership, Broadway Federal Savings grew into a $57 million company. During his tenure as president of the association, he enrolled in the American Savings and Loan Institute evening school and obtained a graduate diploma in the operation and management of savings and loan associations. Dr. Hudson is now president emeritus of Broadway Federal Savings and Loan Association of Los Angeles, having retired from the presidency in 1972.

In 1962, at charter day exercises, Dr. Hudson received the Distinguished Alumnus Award from his alma mater, Howard University, for distinguished service as a dentist, businessman, and civil rights advocate.

He serves as a member of the Los Angeles County Real Estate Advisory Commission and as a member of the board of trustees of the Martin Luther King Memorial Hospital. The auditorium of King Hospital was named in honor of Dr. H. Claude Hudson. Loyola University,

Los Angeles, CA, established a scholarship in honor of Dr. H. Claude Hudson in June 1974.

In 1974, Dr. Hudson was awarded the Humanitarian of the Year Award of the Aid United Givers of the Biltmore Bowl of the Biltmore Hotel in Los Angeles. Upon his introduction as guest speaker, the audience of several thousand gave him a standing ovation. After the audience was reseated, Dr. Hudson began his acceptance speech by saying, "The ovation that you have just given me amazes me when I think of the fact that when I arrived in Los Angeles in 1923 I was not allowed to enter this hotel, and now to be the guest of honor shows me how far you have come." The audience at his request then stood and gave themselves a big round of applause.

At the Wiley College baccalaureate commencement convocation held on the campus of the college in Marshall, TX, on May 6, 1976, Dr. Hudson was awarded the honorary degree of doctor of humanities.

In mid-winter of 1976, Dr. Hudson received the honorary degree of doctor of laws from the University of Southern California, being the second citizen of black ancestry to be so honored by this great university.

The Distinguished Service Medal was awarded to Dr. Hudson on April 19, 1976, by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors, which is the highest honor the board of supervisors can bestow upon one of its citizens.

In 1976, the Commission on Human Relations of Los Angeles County awarded Dr. Hudson the John Anson Ford Award in human relations. In 1976, at the age of 90, he surprised his many friends and acquaintances by taking unto himself a bride, the former Lena Brown Work, a retired mathematics teacher and college adviser in the Los Angeles school system.

In 1977, Dr. Hudson was presented the Civil Rights Award of the National Dentist Association. In 1978, the Senate of the State of California presented an Outstanding Service Award, to his community, to Dr. H. Claude Hudson.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Hudson epitomizes in so many ways the best our country can produce. His commitment to civil rights and dedication to the community are truly an inspiration to all who know him. I would like all my colleagues to join me in honoring Dr. H. Claude Hudson, who on April 19, 1986, will be 100 years young.

INTRODUCTION OF FOUR BILLS TO DEVELOP AND DEREGULATE THE U.S. LINER FLEET

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise in behalf of the leadership of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to introduce by request, four bills to amend the 1936 Merchant Marine Act. The 1936 act established a complex system of financial assistance to aid the U.S. merchant marine. Congress recognized the important role of the merchant marine in times of national emergency and that a U.S.-flag maritime fleet was necessary if our Nation was to develop as a major trade and military power.

It is ironic that in recent years as we have devoted tremendous attention to the military needs of our Nation, we have ignored, neglected, and disregarded what continues to be the essential fourth arm of defense—our merchant marine.

The problems of the 1980's unfortunately cannot always be satisfactorily solved with solutions fashioned in the 1930's. The impact of our attempts to resolve the budget deficit crisis on essential activities such as our merchant marine has been devastating, and we must address our urgent attention to answers that will address the needs of the merchant marine not only today but for the balance of this century.

The industry most immediately affected has been engaged in efforts to present the Congress with a unified position on a solution to the crisis facing the merchant marine. Unfortunately, time is running short and rather than a single unified industry position, we have been presented with four approaches. In order to move the process along, I together with Messrs. LENT, BIAGGI, and SNYDER have agreed to introduce all four bills at the request of their proponents. These bills together with other concepts already before the committee will serve as the basis for legislative distillation.

It is the committee's goal to present to the Congress a single bill that will be responsive to the needs of the Nation, the industry, and the budget.

A TRIBUTE TO CHARLIE HALLECK

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. de la GARZA. Mr. Speaker, long will I remember how impressed I was with Representative Charlie Halleck when I arrived as a brand new Member of the House in 1965 to be sworn-in for the 89th Congress.

To a young fellow from the Texas Legislature, I was interested in being within the same quarters as those about whom I had read in the papers and seen on television for such a long time.

Certainly Congressman Halleck set a record of some kind, having served as both majority and minority leader—that is an accomplishment that doesn't happen to many.

His family can always live with the realization that their father was one of the Nation's greats—a man who won respect and the admiration of all in this body.

A POET LAUREATE FOR THE UNITED STATES

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, following an act of Congress creating the post of Poet Laureate, the Librarian of Congress, Daniel Boorstin, installed writer Robert Penn Warren as Poet Laureate of the United States. At first blush this appeared a curious if not questionable act. After all, the role of poet laureate is a British tradition embodying all the trappings of an aristocracy which our society purports to reject.

The poet laureate tradition dates from early 17th century England. There is seem disagreement about the first appointee but most authorities identify John Dryden. His responsibilities as laureate were to celebrate in verse major state events and other weight occasions such as birthdays of the monarch. Not surprisingly, such a tradition held little charm for Americans.

In the American context the appointment creates a concrete, tangible symbol to make explicit a solid but diffuse notion that art is truly important among our national priorities. Moreover, it affirms the role of government as an active collaborator with the private sector in supporting and encouraging excellence in the arts. There is nothing new in this. Historically, our Government, with widespread popular backing, has always vigorously promoted artistic expression. Importantly, the form of this support has recognized the artist and his work as far more than a dispensable luxury to be patronized in times of plenty. In the depths of the Great Depression, among the major New Deal programs were the Federal artists and writers projects which ensured that our society would emerge from that dark period intact in soul as well as body. What is new is the crystallization of this tradition represented by the Poet Laureate appointment.

Reflecting on this appointment and its antecedent tradition reinforces the principle that art not only enhances civilized life but sustains it; that art is a uniquely human endeavor and lacking outlets for creativity we would not be fully alive.

This appointment also invites us to consider the functions of art in society.

Often the artist and his work serve as mirrors and preservers capturing the prevailing beliefs and values of a society in a concrete, tangible form. Inevitably, the serious student of our own or another culture, past or present, will look to its major artistic works as a source of understanding.

Ironically, the artistic enterprise is often both conservator and iconoclast. Frequently the artist as social critic both symbolizes and stimulates the emergence of a new order. By its very nature the expressive essence of art is fertile ground for the growth of new ideas.

Functions of reflection and criticism are not contradictions, for any society is a dynamic relationship between pressures for change in several directions. In this dynamic process the artist plays the vital role of creating comprehensible forms out of the often bewildering flux of ideas and beliefs. His work gives concrete shape and texture to abstract and elusive notions which pulse like currents through our complex world.

But more vital than flash freezing the waves of change, the artists, especially the great artists, give definition and form to enduring abstractions such as good and evil, love and hate, beauty and trust. It is for this reason that the classic artist can speak with equal veracity to the 14th century cobbler and today's systems analyst.

In the process of articulating ideals and values, the artist creates models readily identifiable by anyone in our vast and multitiered society. Heroes, villains, and fools expemplify for appropriate response our ideals, failings and foibles. For example, I suspect that Pinocchio's nose is a far more powerful force in shaping children's values than abstract discussions of truth and falsity.

Serious accomplished artists are merely a fraction of our population yet their impact involves literally millions. One consequence of this mass impact is the opportunity for vast numbers of people to share concurrently in the ideas and emotions contained in artistic creations. In this phenomenon we have a form of public dialog at an unprecedented scale on complex but vital moral, spiritual, and esthetic issues.

If this brief and fragmented list is even partially valid it confirms my belief in the aptness of establishing a position to symbolize and enshrine artistic excellence. The choice of the first incumbent, Robert Penn Warren, is especially appropriate.

His record of excellence as poet, novelist, essayist, and critic is awesome. But equally impressive are certain qualities of the man and his work. To that special forum of public discussion which is modern literature, Mr. Warren has contributed abundantly and significantly. As simultaneous critic and observer he has reminded us of our own roots with vivid evocations of the virtues of our agrarian past. In two of his best novels, "At Heaven's Gate" (1943) and "All the King's Men" (1946), he incisively examines the dark side of public life-corruption, demogoguery, and the abuse of power. His own personal response to the appointment exemplifies the independence of thought and expression cherished in our society and demonstrated by the roles of the artist in it. He rejects the historic regal trappings of the position and even denies its value as an encouragement to aspiring yound artists. In short, his appointment confirms the assertion of Mr. Warran;'s wife that in creating this position, contrary to British tradition, the Government honors the artist.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, April 11, 1986, pro baseball returned to Ventura County. The Ventura County Gulls, a class A affiliate of the Toronto Blue Jays, opened their California league regular schedule against the Reno Padres.

This marks the first time in 31 years that Ventura County has had professional baseball and the red carpet has been rolled out for the Gulls. Thanks for bringing this team to Ventura County go to Jim Biby and former ballplayer Ken McMullen.

I urge my colleagues to join me in welcoming the Gulls and wishing them a winning season. Play ball!

IS AID SERIOUS ABOUT PRIVATE SECTOR DEVELOPMENT?

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, shortly after the Reagan administration took office in 1981, the Agency for International Development [AID] established a new Bureau for Private Enterprise. Its purpose was to stimulate the private sector within developing countries.

Since the economies of most developing countries are agriculturally based, a top priority for the new Bureau was to stimulate the flow of capital and technology from the private agribusiness sector in the United States to counterparts in developing nations.

One of the first efforts of the Bureau was to fund the Joint Agricultural Consultative Corporation [JACC], a private nonprofit corporation headed by former Agriculture Secretary Orville Freemen. Secretary Freeman had pioneered the JACC effort in Nigeria under a bilateral agreement signed by the United States and Nigerian Governments in 1980.

Under the AID/JACC funding agreement signed in 1982, JACC was asked to expand its efforts beyond Nigeria to several additional countries over the following 3 years. Eventually, the total number of countries covered under the agreement reached 11: Belize, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, Indonesia, Ivory Coast, Nigeria, Panama, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, and Thailand.

The JACC program has stimulated the creation of broad-based, affiliated agribusiness committees in those countries. In addition, professionally staffed offices have been established in eight of them, with funding provided almost entirely from local resources. Here in the United States, the JACC has created individual country committees, consisting of 65 U.S. agribusiness companies having an investment interest in these 11 countries.

Over the course of the last 3 years, the JACC, in cooperation with its overseas affiliates, has provided help for hundreds of private agribusiness firms in those countries, linking them with private companies in the United States. More than 30 joint ventures have already been formed, valued at over $140 million, with several hundred million dollars worth of projects still in the pipline. Total cost to the U.S. Government: $1.5 million over the entire 3 years.

Despite this phenomenal success story, AID suddenly decided late in 1985 to terminate funding for JACC. This decision was apparently made by the Bureau's new Assistant Administrator, Ms. Neal Peden, in spite of a commitment in May, 1985, to continue funding for at least another 3 years and in spite of a recommendation for continued funding from the President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise.

Opposition to the decision to terminate funding was immediate, both overseas and in the United States. Among those opposing the decision were our Ambassadors to Nigeria and the Ivory Coast. As a result, Ms. Peden agreed to take another look. She commissioned three private contracting firms to visit overseas JACC affiliate offices, committees and companies. All of the reports she received from these contractors were apparently positive toward the JACC program. Yet, no new funding agreement has been reached.

Mr. Speaker, I am including an editorial about the JACC program at the conclusion of my remarks. It states the case for continuing the JACC very well.

It is my hope that AID will seriously consider continued funding for this worthwhile program, and won't seek to create new mechanisms to perform services that the JACC is already providing. Congress has generously funded the activities of the Private Enterprise Bureau over the years, and this episode raises troubling questions.

In particular, if the Bureau cannot appreciate a success story like this, one has to wonder whether it is up to the task with which it has been charged.

Is AID Serious About Private Sector Development?

Since its incorporation as a nonprofit organization in 1982, the Joint Agricultural Consultative Corporation (JACC) has helped to expand the agricultural horizons of developing nations in Africa, Southeast Asia, Central America and the Caribbean. Begun with the help of a grant from the U.S. Agency for International Development, through the Bureau of Private Enterprise, JACC's mission is the establishment of an informational network between private industry's agribusiness firms in the United States and agribusiness entrepreneurs in foreign developing countries. The goal is to provide direct help to foreign agribusiness companies who are looking for U.S. joint venture partners, to provide technical assistance in their development of specific agricultural resources and the transferral of technologies that will expand the agricultural bases of these foreign countries and help them to reduce their dependency on imports, and at the same time, increase their exports.

The lack of agricultural technology systems in developing countries is having the most severe consequences to the citizens of these nations. This lack of technology and support coupled with these countries' fragile economies, makes the development of a strong and viable agricultural base within these countries an arduous task.

In 1985, the citizens of the world witnessed the struggle for life in Ethopia. The ferocity of the drought in Africa made clear the fact that unexpected natural disasters can greatly undermine a nation's ability to provide adequate food for its countrymen. And as the agricultural technologies in these developing countries are at best only rudimentary, under these conditions even the most dedicated and conscientious efforts on the part of the citizens of the world to bring relief to those victims of the famine still come too late for many.

Since man first began communicating with signs and symbols, through the development of the spoken and written word, through the stages of agrarian societies and on into the industrial revolution, we now have come to experience the informational revolution. We have the technology, experience and knowledge to prevent starvation, and at the same time, establish strong agricultural bases within developing countries and help them to become economically and nutritionally independent.

We see JACC as an instrument capable of transmitting that information and expertise to developing nations beset by antiquated farming and agricultural techniques. We see JACC's efforts to include private industry in this endeavour as a way for U.S. firms to, at the same time, take advantage of the excellent trade and investment opportunities inherent in this challenge. In its December 2, 1985 newsletter, an update of JACC's activities states that in the past three years, private agribusiness committees have been established in eleven developing nations. In eight of these countries, local affiliate offices and professional staff have been established, funded almost entirely with local funds. This indicates that JACC has been successful in the establishment of long-term foreign investment contracts with these countries while effectively leveraging local funds to help finance these efforts.

In the past three years, JACC has directly assisted the formation of over thirty joint venture enterprises involving U.S. and foreign agribusiness firms, the total estimated value of which exceeds $140 million. Also, as of September 1985, another twenty projects were in the "advanced stages of negotiation," partners had been identified for another thirty projects, and an additional eighty were in the U.S. "search" phase of developmnet. Should all of these ventures make it to the "established enterprise stage," the total project value would exceed one billion U.S. dollars.

Under the chairmanship of former U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman, the Joint Agricultural Consultative Corporation has expanded its activities into the countries of Belize, Cameroon, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Honduras, Indonesia, Ivory Coast, Nigeria, Panama, Philippines, Sri Lanka and Thailand. JACC has established a Washington, D.C. office, organized U.S. JACC Country Committees, introduced the JACC concept and structure to targeted countries, provided assistance to JACC countries in organizing and financing their in-country JACC committees, offices and staffs, processed requests for joint ventures and technology transfers to JACC targeted countries, sponsored and participated in conferences to promote the socio-economic interests inherent in the mission of JACC, engaged in some limited activities related to the review of foreign government policies affecting private enterprise and direct foreign investment, promoted private source revenues to reduce future financial dependence on AID, and hosted numerous individual office meetings to explain the JACC organization and operating structure.

Through these endeavours, JACC and its private industry members retain the capability to help developing nations meet their increased food and fiber needs and helps bring focus to future development of the infrastructure necessary to store, transport, market and export increase commodity production.

The U.S. Agency for International Development has announced that assessments are being completed on the decision to terminate US JACC/AID funding agreement. Should this funding be terminated, JACC will probably have no other option than to convert the JACC into a "for profit" investor-owned company. Through the years of its operation, JACC has steadfastly held to its original purpose to facilitate the technology transfer process and attract private U.S. investment in developing country agribusiness. JACC represents a number of medium-sized U.S. companies which, without JACC assistance, would probably not be involved in developing country agribusiness projects. JACC committees, set up in key developing countries, have both U.S. and Third World agribusiness participants, who exchange information and pursue joint ventures.

In its December 1984 report to the President of the United States, The President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise stated: "The Joint Agricultural Consultative Corporation (JACC) should receive continued and expanded support from the Agency for International Development." The report goes on to mention that the AID should support organizations and programs that serve as brokers between the U.S. private sector and the Less Developed Countries (LDC) private sector. Many times, because they lack sufficient information about international markets, U.S. firms ignore opportunities to go overseas because of what appears to them unknown, high-risk markets, too undefined and "unattainable" to be worth the effort.

JACC helps to bridge the gap and provide informational services between the U.S. private sector and the LDC private sector. Through its sponsorship of feasibility studies of foreign countries' agricultural potential and in providing assistance to obtain loan capital to finance these enterprises, the JACC helps to ensure the environment the agribusiness community needs in order to negotiate mutually advantageous business agreements.

We at INFOS recognize the accomplishments of JACC and its overseas affiliates and strongly support its mission and goals to sustain and enrich the lives of all residents of this planet. Beyond the differences of race and creed and economic status remains the common need for sustenance. As individual members of the human race, we are bound by a brotherhood of instinct—an instinct to be physically, emotionally and spiritually whole. We must work together to help sustain physical life on this planet. Although we here in the United States are blessed with advanced technology and an abundance of things necessary to enrich our lives, in the spirit of international brotherhood we must, for the future of our planet, see to it that all of our brothers and sisters and their children have at least the basic foods and nutritional elements required to sustain life. The Joint Agricultural Consultative Corporation promotes and encourages world food productivity through private enterprise.

We at INFOS suggest to our readers that they do all in their power to help assure continued funding of the JACC program. The challenge to those of us living in the informational revolution is to experience the freedom and benefits inherent to our ability to share the technologies and information we have with all of our fellow human beings within the global community.

FISHERMEN DESERVE OPPORTUNITY TO COMPETE FAIRLY IN THEIR OWN MARKET

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, on March 14, 1986, the International Trade Administration in the Department of Commerce announced that it had determined that imports of fresh Atlantic groundfish from Canada were being subsidized. The ITA noted that a total of 55 programs administered by the Canadian Federal Government and the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, and Quebec provided subsidies to the Canadian fresh fish industry. Unfortunately, however, the Department of Commerce did not consider all programs—particularly the off-season payments made directly to unemployed fishermen by the Canadian Government—to constitute a countervailable subsidy.

In its determination, the Department of Commerce did not dispute the fact that the unemployment compensation provided to Canada's self-employed fishermen is governed by a special statutory provision and directed at a specific type of industry. The Department stated, however, that fishermen who received unemployment insurance through this program did not receive benefits on more preferential terms than those who received benefits under other Canadian unemployment programs.

One key criterion that can be used to establish whether or not preferential treatment has been afforded is the ratio of benefits provided to premiums paid. It has been clearly established by the North Atlantic Fisheries Task Force, in their petition on behalf of United States fishermen, that the level of benefits paid by the Canadian Government to the premiums paid by Canadian fishermen is at least 12 to 1. Such a ratio is, in my view, substantially disproportionate and, I believe, prima facie evidence of the type of subsidy that has contributed to the injury of U.S. fishermen.

I have introduced legislation today which clarifies the definition of subsidy to include unemployment insurance programs if the benefit recipient is allowed to draw a substantially disproportionate amount of benefits relative to the costs incurred in participating in the program. The purpose of this legislation is to discourage foreign countries from providing direct financial assistance to specific industries under the guise of social welfare that function as a direct granting of funds to aid in the manufacture, production or export of any product. This legislation is in response to the Department of Commerce's final determination in its countervailing duty investigation of fresh Atlantic groundfish from Canada. It is my intention, however, that the changes made by this legislation would apply in all investigations where unemployment compensation is an alleged subsidy.

Mr. Speaker, in the existing trading environment, our fishing industry lacks both the market power and the Government support to stand up to the Canadian industry. I believe, however, that given the chance to compete fairly, our fishing industry can hold its own. Our fishermen have proven their case—they deseve an opportunity to compete fairly in their own market, and I urge my colleagues to support me in this effort to provide the tools necessary to bring about a sense of equity.

CONGRATULATIONS TO COACH JODY CONRADT AND THE UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM, AND COACH RICHARD QUICK AND THE TEXAS WOMEN'S SWIM TEAM, NCAA NATIONAL CHAMPIONS

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, if you had been in Austin, TX, last week, you could not have failed to notice the University of Texas tower which was lit twice to honor University of Texas national championships in women's basketball and swmming.

The University of Texas Lady Longhorns' basketball team who won their first national basketball championship by defeating the University of Southern California, 97–81.

The University of Texas women's swim team also won the national championship, their third in 3 years, by outpointing the University of Florida, 633–586, in Fayetteville.

Our hats are off to both teams for their accomplishments.

The Lady Longhorns are, without a doubt, one of the most powerful and one of the winningest basketball teams in the history of women's college basketball. They were ranked No. 1 in the country the entire year and compiled a remarkable 34–0 undefeated season. They may very well be the best women's basketball team ever assembled.

The Lady Longhorns' victory was especially sweet for the seniors of the team who had been to the playoffs before but had come up short. Over the last 4 years, the Lady Longhorns have had one of the winningest programs in the country, but the seniors on the team saved their best for last—a national championship. What a way to top off their collegiate careers.

And we can't help but share Coach Conradt's enthusiasm for the performance of the Lady Longhorns that came off the bench to help seal the victory. Indeed, if Coach Conradt is right, and I'm taking her at her word, that it doesn't matter who starts on this team, then I'm planning to be standing in the well of the House this time next year complimenting them on their second national championship.

And what about the Texas Women's Swim Team? This is the third national title for the women's swim team in 3 years and most of our swimmers from this year's team will be returning, so I may very well find myself back here next year congratulating them on their fourth national championship.

Coach Richard Quick, who, I might add, is the 1988 Olympic swimming coach, has put together one of the strongest swimming programs in the country. I think this bodes well for our 1988 Olympic Swim Team, which I assume will be represented by Texas swimmers.

This particular championship was a total team effort as evidenced by the fact that the Texas team only won four of the 22 total events, yet still managed to win the championship. Teamwork and team depth were the key.

To Coach Conradt and the Lady Longhorns, and to Coach Richard Quick and the Texas Women's Swim Team, I simply want to say, well done, you make us proud, and "Hook Em Horns!"

SALUTE TO THE COPE-O'BRIEN CENTER

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a center dedicated to helping youths in need.

The Washtenaw County O'Brien Center for Youth Development/Center for Occupational and Personalized Education, Inc.—referred to as the COPE-O'Brien Center—is celebrating its 15th anniversary.

Founded in March 1971, the COPE-O'Brien Center has been instrumental in offering essential individualized therapeutic and alternative educational services for behaviorally troubled and needy adolescents aged 13 to 21, living in Michigan's Washtenaw County.

The COPE-O'Brien Center works with one philosophy: that, given the opportunity to receive critical skill training and specialized treatment with regard to both vocation and education, the quality of these young people's lives and their chances for becoming productive and responsible adults will improve significantly.

Annually, more than 200 youths are served at the center. Totally, some 2,500 have benefited from its services during the last 15 years. The center has been considered a valuable asset to the community and has been given consistent public funding support at the local, State, and Federal level.

COPE-O'Brien Center represents a unique resource sharing model which integrates a public/private partnership in the delivery of youth services, and has been recognized as a model youth service program by the Michigan Department of Social Services, and the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges.

I think it only fitting, Mr. Speaker, that I ask my colleagues to join with me in saluting the COPE-O'Brien Center for its outstanding work and wish them another 15 years of success.

A TAX POLICY FOR TODAY AND THE FUTURE—HOW TO SAVE TAX REFORM

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today, April 15, is a day that is foremost in the minds of American taxpayers. This April 15, taxpayers again face filing Federal tax returns after months of work and confusion. Congress also faces confusion in sorting out months of work on reforming our Internal Revenue Code. Unfortunately, it has become apparent that proposals under consideration fail to address the role of tax policy in competing in our world economy. It is for this reason I am introducing legislation to address the ills of current tax reform proposals before Congress. Legislation to enact a strong and broad-based business alternative minimum tax or BAMT.

The BAMT would more nearly harmonize our tax system with those of our major trading partners, would help to level the playing field with foreign competition, and it would ensure that corporations which currently pay little or no income tax would pay a substantial amount of tax. Most importantly, the BAMT would pay for a capital formation system nearly as generous as current law and would replace either the current minimum tax or the onerous and loophole-filled minimum tax proposals under consideration by Congress.

Currently, our major trading partners utilize value-added taxes to raise the majority of their revenues. These VAT's tax imported goods raising substantial revenues from American exports. This is one more example of our Nations inability to utilize our Tax Code to level the playing field with our foreign competition. Japan is now considering implementing a VAT to enhance their trading position. The time has come for America to move toward harmonizing our tax system with our trading partners and the business alternative minimum tax does just that.

Let me emphasize that the BAMT is not a VAT. It acts as an alternative minimum tax to the Federal income tax and places a 7-percent tax on the net business receipts of trade or business. The BAMT also taxes all imports and exempts all exports as is allowed under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT]. Credits are allowed against the Federal income tax, FICA liability, and the BAMT also includes a small business exemption of $10 million to avoid hindering new business growth. The BAMT is not an add-on tax easily increased as a VAT could be; it is instead an alternative tax and includes specific language limiting any increase to a ratio directly corresponding with the income tax. In addition, a two-thirds vote by both Houses of Congress is needed to increase the rate. As an alternative tax, the BAMT is not a regressive tax as a VAT would be.

Finally, the BAMT raises $205 billion over five years, 68 percent from imports, and would pay for a tax reform bill American business could live with. Doesn't it make sense that we subsidize our economy with revenues from our trading partners as they do from us? I urge my colleagues in the Congress to join me in addressing both a short-term goal of keeping our Nation's economy healthy and a long-term goal of implementing a tax policy to harmonize our system for competing effectively and efficiently in our future world economy. The BAMT generates the revenue necessary to lower tax rates for all Americans while maintaining a strong economy and a more equitable playing field in the international trade arena.

PROTECT SATELLITE DISH OWNERS

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3989 has rightly been called the Rural Satellite Dish Owners Protection Act. Many of the satellite dish owners throughout our country, and especially in Michigan's 10th District which I represent, live in rural areas where Earth-based satellite technology brings them a variety of television programming that would not otherwise be available to them.

The cable TV industry has legitimate concerns over the effects of satellite dish use for its business. But what they have proposed to do about this puts unfair penalties on satellite dish owners. The cable programmers want to scramble their signal—and in some areas they have already begun to do so—before insuring that decoding devices for wisely available and at a reasonable cost. Furthermore, cable programmers have come to no agreement on a uniform method for scrambling their programs, and different scrambling techniques would render one decoder useless for unscrambling other programs. Finally, cable programmers have even considered providing service to dish owners at a higher subscription rate than regular cable subscribers. These solutions that the cable programmers have offered can only be described as punitive against the satellite dish owners.

Mr. Speaker, I have agreed to cosponsor H.R. 3989 because it offers a solution to the conflict between satellite dish owners and cable programmers that is fair to both and punitive toward neither. This legislation permits cable programmers to scramble, but in accordance with uniform standards and after a 30-day moratorium which will allow time for decoders to become more widely available at more reasonable prices. This legislation allows cable programmers to charge satellite owners a subscription fee, but not at a rate that exceeds the fee charged regular cable subscribers.

Mr. Speaker, satellite dish owners are willing to pay their fair share for the programming they now enjoy, and no less. But also, no more. Previously, I have given my support to H.R. 1769 and H.R. 1840, Legislation also designed to achieve an equitable solution to this problem. Rural residents throughout our country, and especially in the district I represent, have turned to us in Congress to help them arrive at a reasonable compromise with cable programmers, one that will allow them to continue to enjoy the programming now available to them. I am committed to achieving such a compromise which is a fair deal for all parties involved in this problem. H.R. 3989 gives us the opportunity to achieve such a compromise, and this is why I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.

A TRIBUTE TO GORDON CARRINGTON

HON. JOHN G. ROWLAND

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to mark the passing of one of my district's finest citizens, Gordon Carrington of Bethany.

Gordon has spent his life trying to make his hometown of Bethany a better place for all of its citizens. He was born in Bethany 64 years ago and from the day he became an adult he began a career of public service, becoming town assessor. For 6 years he served on the board of assessors and later served on the town's first zoning board. On July 23, 1963, Gordon became first selectman of Bethany, a post his neighbors reelected him to in every election since. At the time of his untimely death Gordon had served as first selectman for 22 years—longer than any other first selectman in Connecticut.

Gordon Carrington's service to the community of Bethany was not restricted to political service. He was both a successful farmer and businessman, as co-owner of the Cherry Tree Farm and owner of an Agway dealership. He was an active member of the Congregational Church, the Bethany Lions Club, and a number of masonic lodges. Prehaps most important of all, Gordon Carrington was a devoted husband and father.

I am sorry to see Gordon Carrington pass away. He will be greatly missed by all who knew him. We can rest easier in the knowledge that Gordon's accomplishments in making Bethany a better place to live will long outlive him.

TRIBUTE TO FRANKLIN A. POLK

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, on May 21, 1986, a distinguished constituent of mine, Franklin A. Polk, will be honored by the Cuyahoga County Bar Association. I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the numerous contributions made by the "Grand Old Man" of the Cleveland legal community.

Mr. Speaker, Franklin Polk is a 1939 graduate of Cleveland State University Law School, who has maintained offices as an individual, general practitioner at 5725 Broadway, Cleveland, OH, for 44 years. In 1948, he was elected president of the Cuyahoga County Bar Association. For 39 years, he has chaired its annual Public Servants Merit Awards committee luncheon in which each year five of the county's most deserving court employees are honored. For 35 years he has been an elected delegate to the Ohio State Bar Association House of Delegates. For 12 years, from 1971 to 1983, Mr. Polk represented the Cuyahoga County Bar Association in the American Bar House of Delegates. These years of devoted service, however, have not gone unrecognized. Mr. Polk is the recipient of numerous awards and honors.

Mr. Speaker, in May 1983, Mr. Polk was awarded the Ohio State Bar Association Medal for his exceptional contributions to furthering the administration of justice. In May 1984, he received the American Judicature Society's Herbert J. Harley Award for his lifetime efforts toward improving the functioning of the Nation's legal system.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Polk has introduced 108 lawyers into the full-time practice of law since 1947. They have memorialized his assistance to them by naming the No. 1 carrel at the Cleveland State University Law School Library after him. Mr. Polk has also served as the National Alumni Association President of John Carroll University, from which he graduated in 1935 after earning an A.B. degree. In 1951, Mr. Polk served as dean of Delta Theta Phi Cleveland Alumni Senate. He has been named as an outstanding alumnus of Cleveland State University Law School, John Carroll University and Delta Theta Phi. In addition, Mr. Polk currently serves on the editorial committee of the Cleveland Bar Association.

Mr. Speaker, Franklin A. Polk has made immeasurable contributions to every bar association, civic organization and fraternal brotherhood he has ever been involved with, and I am extremely honored to join in the salute to him. He has unselfishly served the Cleveland community for more than 40 years, and I join with the Cuyahoga County Bar Association in paying tribute to him.

TRADE TALKS WITH KOREA

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the significance of the talks being held between representatives of the United States and the Republic of Korea, one of our key trading partners. Leaders from business and government in seven Southeastern States will be meeting April 20–22 in Miami Beach with a Korean delegation, headed by Minister of Trade and Industry Jin-Ho Kum, to discuss opportunities for establishing new economic ties between our two regions.

We are proud that Florida is hosting this conference. We believe the whole Southeastern United States is rich in potential for increased exports to Korea.

Korea is a key ally for us in the Pacific. We have a vital security interest in seeing that it maintains a strong economy to support its heavy defense burden. Koreans have the fourth largest international debt among the developed countries.

The backbone of the Korean economy is trade. Already, Korea is the eighth largest purchaser of United States goods. Expanded economic relationships with the United States are key to Korea's continued stability.

We are heartened by Korea's apparent desire to engage in international trade on a good-faith basis. Unlike other countries, Korea is not committed to a program of industrial self-sufficiency. Its leaders seem to recognize that restricting imports could trigger retaliatory trade actions that would devastate its economy.

The current discussions with the Koreans could furnish a blueprint for working with our other trading partners. This approach provides us with an alternative to instituting restrictive, protectionist policies. We stand to gain more from adopting an international trading policy grounded in cooperation rather than confrontation.

CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I have had the privilege of participating in the Call to Conscience Vigil since it was first organized in 1976. I would like to commend this year's sponsor, our distinguished colleague, Representative TOM KINDNESS, for organizing this ongoing manifestation of congressional support for Soviet Jewry. As always, I am glad to do my part in demonstrating Congress' concern for the plight of the Jewish minority in the U.S.S.R.

I regret, however, Mr. Speaker, that today also marks the 10th year that I have taken the floor to draw our colleagues' attention to the case of Vladimir and Maria Slepak. For a decade now, I have spoken on behalf of the Slepak family of Moscow, a family that has been attempting to emigrate to Israel since 1970. Vladimir and Maria's two sons were allowed to emigrate to Israel in the late 1970's and Maria's mother and sister also live there. Vladimir, a radio and television engineer and member of the Moscow Helsinki Group, and Maria, a physician, spent 5 years in remote Siberian exile for protesting against the Soviet refusal to grant them exit visas. Since December 1982, when they returned to Moscow from exile, the Slepaks have renewed their efforts to be reunited with their children and the grandchildren they have never seen.

Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, I had the honor of meeting Maria and Vladimir Slepak in Moscow. Along with one distinguished colleague, Representative BROOMFIELD, I met with many of the Moscow Jewish community's long-term refuseniks. We told them of the Congress' commitment to their freedom and pledged ourselves to do all that we could to achieve that goal. And, in all our meetings with Soviet officials, including General Secretary Gorbachev, we raised the issue of Jewish emigration and highlighted specific cases. While we received no assurances, we were told that the cases were raised—including, of course, the Slepaks—would be reviewed and decisions reconsidered. I am, therefore, very hopeful that I will not be compelled to take the floor again next year, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Slepaks but that they will, after a 16-year-long wait, be reunited with relatives in Israel.

Mr. Speaker, today the 35 nations that signed the Helsinki final act are meeting in Bern, Switzerland, to open the Experts Meeting on Human Contacts. This 6-week-long meeting will cover the issue of family reunification, family visits, travel, and emigration. Specific cases of divided families, such as the Slepaks, will be raised and discussed. Let the Soviet Union use the occasion of the Bern meeting to demonstrate their professed fidelity to the final act with concrete actions and allow the emigration of the Slepak family.

IN HONOR OF JACK WOOD

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of Jack Wood who will leave public office in Hermosa Beach on April 15, 1986.

Jack has served on the Hermosa Beach City Council for 4 years and most recently served as mayor. He has been a resident of Hermosa Beach for 16 years.

He was educated at Norwich University where he received his bachelors degree in civil engineering. He earned a masters in business administration from Cal State University in 1975. He has worked as a private consulting engineer in Hermosa Beach and has been active in both the Hermosa Beach Rotary Club and Hermosa Beach Chamber of Commerce.

He served his country in the U.S. Army as a combat engineer during the Vietnam war and was made an officer.

To mark Jack's departure from public office, I ask that my colleagues join me in wishing him the best of luck in all of his future endeavors.

ACTION BY ADMINISTRATION MAY LEAD TO SELLING OF TVA

HON. JIM COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the administration recently announced their intention to sell the five Federal Power Marketing Administrations (PMAs) to the private sector. I am deeply concerned that this action could eventually lead to the selling of the Tennessee Valley Authority [TVA]. I wish to bring to my colleagues' attention a study which I hope will help inform them as to the impact such a move would have on ratepayers in the Tennessee Valley.

THE RATE IMPACT IMPLICIT IN THE HERITAGE FOUNDATION STUDY OF SELLING THE FIVE FEDERAL POWER MARKETING ADMINISTRATIONS AND THE TVA POWER SYSTEM

The Heritage Foundation study by Senior Policy Analyst Milton Copulos concludes that selling the five PMAs and the TVA power system would:

1. Yield significant long-term benefits to the consumers of PMA- and TVA-generated power through greater efficiency and accountability.

2. Help solve the deficit problem by raising $100 billion—even after all debts from revenue bonds were repaid.

An initial review of the study as it relates to TVA indicates both these conclusions are false. The $62 billion price tag for the TVA power system meets neither the test of financial common sense nor of protecting the public interest. Determining the market value of TVA involves not only complex financial and accounting questions, but fundamental legislative and regulatory uncertainties. There is no way to value TVA's power assets without knowing how the output produced by those assets would be priced, i.e., how rates for a "privatized" TVA would be set. Thus, the amount that the Treasury would realize is problematical at best, and in any event would be a one-shot affair that would not change the basic economic problems caused by the Federal deficit in a beneficial way.

In this paper, we deal primarily with the interrelated issues of whether the sale price for the TVA power system established in the Heritage study makes financial sense and the magnitude of the rate impact on TVA's customers that is implicit in it.

1. The rate impact of the sale of the TVA power system for $62 billion would be cataclysmic:

In order to yield $62 billion to the Government under a typical 60 percent debt and 40 percent equity financing arrangement, annual power system revenue requirements would have to increase by $7.18 billion in order to complete the transaction. (Based on average returns on utility debt and equity.)

An increase in revenue requirements of $7.18 billion would imply a rate increase of 158 percent.

An increase in revenue requirements of that magnitude would increase the monthly residential electric bill for 1,000 kWh from the current level of about $50 to $115.

With average annual residential use in the TVA service area at about 14,418 kWh per year (residential average use in 1984), the annual bill would increase from $720 to $1,645—an increase of $925 for the average residential customer.

This proposal would give the Tennessee Valley the highest electric rates in the Southeast by a large margin (they are now among the lowest). Of the major U.S. cities only New York City would have higher electric rates.

Moreover, as their contracts with TVA expired, TVA's customers would leave the system in order to buy the now much cheaper power available from contiguous utility systems. In turn this would drive up TVA's rates even further as the higher revenue requirements were spread over fewer and fewer ratepayers.

The derivation of this rate impact is shown in table 1. We have used very conservative assumptions as to interest rates and required rates of return. In reality, a substantial "risk premium" would be demanded by the financial markets for the sort of transaction outlined in the study—increasing the impact substantially.

Table 1.—Rate impact if TVA were sold: 60 percent financing by debt, 40 percent by equity

Assumptions:	Billion
Sale price of	$62.0
Financed by long-term bonds at 9.5 percent	37.2
New shares earning the average rate of return for the utility industry of 15.6 percent	24.8
Major changes in TVA's revenue requirements
[In billions]
Decreases:
Long-term interest	$1.55
Repayment to U.S. Treasury	0.12
Increase in retained earnings	0.33
Total decrease	2.00
Increases:
Interest on new debt	3.53
Return on equity	3.87
Increase in depreciation	1.78
Total increase	9.18
Net change	7.18
Current revenue payments	4.55
Percent increase	158

2. The structure of the sale as proposed in the Heritage Foundation study is all equity financing scheduled in two phases: an initial offering of 51 percent of the value of the agency's assets with the Government retaining a 49 percent share to be sold at a later date.

This arrangement would increase the revenue requirements and rate impact substantially above the 158 percent increase implicit in the 60 percent debt and 40 percent equity arrangement described previously.

The net increase in revenue requirements that would follow the initial 51 percent offering would be $4.71 billion, approximately a 104 percent increase. This assumes, of course, that the Government would be willing to forego any dividends on its 49 percent equity.

This would raise the current monthly residential bill of about $50 for 1,000 kWh to about $95.

As the second phase of the proposed offering went into effect, revenue requirements would increase another $4.74 billion. This also assumes that the first issue maintained its initial value, keeping in mind that in order for the shares in the first issue to retain their value, rates would have had to more than double, and that TVA's customers would not have left the system to obtain cheaper power elsewhere.

The combined impact for the two phases of the sale as proposed by the Heritage Foundation would be to raise revenue requirements by $9.45 billion, leading to a 208 percent increase.

Translating this into a increase in the average annual residential bill means the current $720 per year would almost triple to about $1,950 per year.

Table 2.—Revenue requirement impact of TVA sale: Heritage Foundation plan

Assumptions:	Billions
Sale price	$62
Financed in two stages by new shares earning the average rate of return in utility industry of 15.6 percent
Major Changes in TVA's Revenue Requirements
[In billions]
PHASE I:
Decreases:
Long-term interest	$1.55
Repayment to Treasury	0.12
Increase in retained earnings	0.33
Phase I decreases	2.00
Increases:
Return on equity (51 percent of $62 billion at 15.6 percent)	$4.93
Increase in depreciation	1.78
Phase I increases	6.71
Net increase Phase I	4.71
Current revenue requirement	4.55
Percent change	104
PHASE II:
Total decrease Phases I and II	2.00
Return on equity (49 percent of $62 billion at 15.6 percent)	4.74
Total increase Phases I and II	11.45
Net increase Phases I and II	9.45
Current revenue requirements	4.55
Percent change	208

3. Aside from the rate implications, the sheer magnitude of the proposed stock offering is so much larger than any previous sale that it makes any prediction of its yield an exercise in conjecture.

The largest previous stock offering was British Telecom in 1984—about $6 billion, but this offering was spread through Europe and Japan as well as the United States.

The largest stock offering made in the U.S. was a $1.17 billion sale of AT&T shares in 1983.

The proposed sale would also yield a very significant fee for the investment bankers underwriting the sale. Assuming a typical fee spread of 1 percent of the face value of the debt and 5 percent of the aggregate proceeds for stock offerings:

The 60/40 "buy out" would yield underwriters fees of $1.6 billion.

The all equity approach advocated by the Heritage Foundation would result in underwriting fees of $3.1 billion.

To put this in perspective, under the Heritage Foundation plan the fees paid to the bankers handling the transaction would exceed the Federal Government's current equity investment in the TVA power system.

The Heritage Foundation also recommends that the proceeds from the proposed sale of Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) be used to pay off the bonds issued to build units four and five of the Washington Public Power Supply System (WPPSS). BPA did not guarantee the bonds issued to build those units, and recent litigation has established BPA has no liability for them. Thus, the arrangement proposed in the study would amount to a very substantial Federal subsidy to the WPPSS bondholders.

Numbers and rate impacts of this magnitude may seem unrealistically large—and in our opinion clearly they are—however, they are also logically implicit in the study's claim that TVA could be sold for $62 million.

Another way to say the same thing is, that in order for rational investors to be willing to pay $62 billion for TVA, they would have to be assured that whoever would have the authority to set rates in the event of such a sale would be willing and able to triple the rates paid by TVA's customers.

Thus it appears that the Heritage Foundation's basic conclusions fail rather badly a basic test of financial and political reductio ad absurdum.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 16, 1986

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

As we anticipate the opportunities and responsibilities of each new day we pray, gracious God, that Your spirit would illumine our minds to see the truth that makes us free, touch our souls so we will be aware of the needs of all Your creation, make us receptive to the demands of justice and mercy that we may know that peace that passes all human understanding and gives hope and purpose to our lives. Amen.

> For purposes of this subsection, the term joint resolution means only a joint resolution introduced within 3 legislative days after the Congress receives the request submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (p).

Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the rule and the International Security Act, only one pending joint resolution qualifies for consideration at this time, and that is Senate Joint Resolution 283 now pending at the Speaker's table since only it was introduced within 3 legislative days of the President's request and only it also contains the text of Senate Joint Resolution 283.

The House joint resolution the Speaker is attempting to bring up is not eligible under the terms of the rule or the International Security Act because it is not a legitimate joint resolution pursuant to that act; that is, it was not introduced within 3 days of the President's request.

I therefore urge that my point of order be sustained, Mr. Speaker, and that the Chair then resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 283, which is the only joint resolution eligible for consideration under the terms of the rule and the International Security Act.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, could the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] very concisely restate his point of order? I do not think many people in the House heard it, and if he could very precisely state what his objection is.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, under the rule and also under the International Security Act, the only thing that is eligible for consideration is Senate Joint Resolution 283, because it was the only one that was introduced within 3 legislative days of the President's request.

The House joint resolution that is attempting to be brought up at this time is not eligible under that rule or the terms of the International Security Act.

Mr. Speaker, in furtherance of that point of order, I would like to make some additional comments.

Mr. Speaker, a review of the Rules Committee transcript on the motion to report the rule reveals that there was no discussion as to intent or interpretation of the phrase, "a joint resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985." Nor was there any elucidation on this phrase in yesterday's debate on the rule. Whatever discussions as to intentions or interpretations which may have taken place behind the closed doors of the committee caucus or in the Speaker's Office are irrelevant to the public record on which any determination as to intent must be based. But, I would point out that one need not look beyond the language of the rule itself if it is clear on its face what it means, since that is the first tenet of statutory construction—the so-called plain meaning rule. And nothing could be plainer than the words "pursuant to" and act which permits "only a joint resolution introduced within 3 legislative days of the President's request."

That is the key phrase, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, of course we dealt with this matter several weeks ago, under the statute as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] is aware. This is an entirely different question; it is a part of a supplemental piece of appropriation pending before this House, and this matter was dealt with, the procedures were complied with, when this matter was dealt with the first time.

Mr. LOTT. If I can be heard further on that point, Mr. Speaker, that was a House joint resolution. Our understanding all along was that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] would be allowed to offer a House joint resolution which incorporated the Senate-passed language, perhaps with some modifications; but that was not what happened when the rule came out and we voted on the rule.

So, Mr. Speaker, I persist in my point of order that the House joint resolution that is attempting to be brought up at this time is not eligible, under the rule or the act.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHEL. Enlarging upon the gentleman's inquiry, and if the Chair is constrained to overrule the gentleman's point of order, then I would also make the parliamentary inquiry: What is the base from which we are operating?

It is not my resolution; it was not referred to any committee; I do not know that there has been any effort here to discharge a committee from consideration of the base resolution; where did it come from? What is the mechanism by which we consider this base resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will respond that the gentleman from Mississippi was really reading the title of the House joint resolution made in order by House Resolution 415; it is that title that refers to the International Security Act.

The House is not operating under that statute, and that statute does acknowledge that the House has the constitutional right to change the procedure at any time under its rulemaking authority. The Committee on Rules and the House have changed the procedure; so the House is not acting under the procedures outlined in the law cited in the title, but under the rule.

As far as the gentleman from Illinois' [Mr. MICHEL] is concerned, there is a joint resolution just numbered by the Clerk, House Joint Resolution 601, and the House rule adopted yesterday makes it in order to consider that resolution, and not Senate Joint Resolution 283.

So the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry. Might I inquire as to who introduced that measure you just made reference to? House Joint Resolution 601.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it was made in order by the rule.

Mr. MICHEL. With no author?

The SPEAKER. It does not have to have an author; it was made in order by the rule.

Mr. MICHEL. Well, that is something unique around here. They are now falling from the sky.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITLEY] to preside over the Committee of the Whole.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 601) relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, with Mr. WHITLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the first reading of the joint resolution is dispensed with.

Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, as we begin this debate again, a very quick review of what the rule adopted yesterday by the very narrow margin of four votes provides is, 2 hours of general debate here on this base resolution after which there will be 2 hours of debate on the so-called Hamilton-Barnes substitute to the base resolution; after which there are 2 hours of debate on the McCurdy substitute or amendment; and then finally 2 hours on the amendment introduced by Mr. MRAZEK.

The procedure is that if perchance the Hamilton-Barnes substitute should prevail, my understanding is then it washes out the other two substitutes; but in any event, there would be 30 minutes of debate prior to a final resolution of this issue before we would engage in debating more specifically the supplemental appropriation bill.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the foreign policy objectives of the United States in Nicaragua are clear. The plan of the President, already approved by the other body, can achieve those objectives. The plans represented by the Hamilton, McCurdy, and Mrazek amendments cannot.

The President has stated American objectives clearly and consistently for several years. Those objectives are to convince the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua to:

End Nicaraguan military and security ties to Cuba, the Soviet Union and other Warsaw Pact countries;

Reduce Nicaraguan military and security forces to a level consistent with Nicaraguan defensive needs;

End Nicaraguan support for subversion and terrorism directed at other countries;

End internal repression of the Nicaraguan people;

Begin good faith diplomatic negotiations in the Contadora process;

Begin the process of national reconciliation by church-mediated dialog with the opposition; and Observe basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right of free election of democratic government.

The President's plan is designed to achieve these objectives through diplomacy coupled with effective support to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. The support for the resistance will give the Sandinistas the incentive to negotiate in good faith with neighboring countries and the internal opposition.

The Hamilton amendment plan will not achieve U.S. foreign policy objectives. All the Hamilton amendment does is turn an effective resistance into refugees dependent on handouts. It does not give the Sandinistas a reason to negotiate. Why should the Sandinistas negotiate if the Hamilton amendment hands them on a silver platter victory over the resistance?

The McCurdy amendment also will not achieve U.S. foreign policy objectives. All the McCurdy amendment does is stall any possibility of progress through the end of July. The McCurdy amendment does not give the Sandinistas a reason to negotiate. It simply states that if the Sandinistas don't negotiate in good faith out of the goodness of their hearts by the end of July, then maybe the Congress might then decide that we ought to give them a reason to negotiate by providing effective support for the resistance. The time to give the Sandinistas a reason to start negotiating is now. We have let them coast along with impunity long enough.

The Mrazek amendment would gut both the President's plan and the ineffective McCurdy amendment plan. It would be foolish to spend money to support the resistance, but then provide that U.S. personnel cannot be involved in making sure that the money is effectively spent.

Only the President's plan can do the job. The Hamilton, McCurdy, and Mrazek amendments cannot do the job and I urge my colleagues to vote against those amendments.

The letter from the Secretary of State follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, DC, April 16, 1986.

Hon. WILLIAM BROOMFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: The McCurdy Amendment to be considered by the House on April 16 again raises the question of our policy on further bilateral negotiations with the Sandinistas. This amendment would require bilateral discussions between the United States and the Government of Nicaragua without requiring the latter to begin negotiations with the Nicaraguan opposition. I would like to review the history of our policy with regard to talks with the Sandinistas and why U.S./Nicaraguan bilaterals by themselves will not contribute to a peaceful settlement in Central America.

During nine rounds of bilateral negotiations in 1984, the Sandinistas rejected our offer of bilateral assurances in exchange for a workable Contadora agreement. By the ninth round, in December 1984, the Sandinista position was very clear: they were using the Manzanillo talks with us as an excuse to refuse to conduct any substantive negotiations with the other countries of Central America. In addition, the Sandinistas sought to create distrust of the United States by telling the Central American democracies that the U.S. was "making a deal" behind their backs. Since December 1984, the Sandinistas have grown increasingly obstructive in the multilateral Contadora talks while making renewal of bilateral talks with the U.S. a priority objective.

The United States remains willing to resume bilateral talks in support of a comprehensive regional agreement, including democratic internal reconciliation within Nicaragua. However, in view of past Sandinista intransigence and duplicity, we have insisted that the Sandinistas demonstrate serious intent by initiating a credible dialogue, accompanied by a ceasefire and restoration of civil liberties, with all elements of their opposition. Our objective is not talks which lead to "power sharing," but rather a sincere effort toward democratization.

In support of this goal, we have made a number of forthright proposals. In April 1985, the President endorsed an offer by the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, in which they proposed a ceasefire and a Church-mediated dialogue with the Sandinistas. In February 1986, we offered to have the U.S. begin bilateral talks simultaneously with the initiation of an internal dialogue by the Sandinistas with their opposition. On March 5, 1986, President Duarte added an offer to begin serious talks with the Salvadoran guerrillas, simultaneously with a Sandinista dialogue with the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

The Nicaraguan resistance has been willing to talk; the Nicaraguan Council of Bishops has offered to mediate. The Presidents of Guatemala and Honduras, the President-elect of Costa Rica, and the United States Government all endorse President Duarte's proposal. The Sandinistas have adamantly rejected all these offers and have obstructed further Contadora meetings. They have insisted on bilateral talks with the U.S. as their foremost objective.

The United States continues to resist the Sandinistas' effort to portray the regional crisis as a bilateral, U.S.-Nicaraguan dispute and the internal Nicaraguan conflict as an artificial creation of the U.S. Given recent events in Honduras, I am more concerned than ever that giving the Sandinistas what they want—direct bilateral talks with the U.S.—would have a number of severe and adverse consequences:

It would seriously undercut President Duarte and his democratic neighbors who have supported him. President Duarte braved considerable internal criticism in his bold offer to open talks with the FMLN guerrillas in El Salvador, if the Sandinistas would simultaneously hold similar talks with the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. His forthright initiative provided an additional inducement that complemented our proposals to further a dialogue on national reconciliation in Nicaragua. We should not be in a position of weakening President Duarte in the eyes of his domestic critics or diminishing his prestige in the region.

It would afford the Sandinistas an opportunity for further duplicity and result in further delay in resolving the conflict. Their past record of dishonesty, during earlier bilateral talks with the U.S., has been duplicated by Sandinista misrepresentations over the invasion of Honduras.

It would divert attention from the evidence of Sandinista performance in the international diplomatic arena, as well as their aggression against their neighbors. The real issues are genuine dialogue leading to democracy in Nicaragua and serious negotiations with their neighbors. They seek to district attention from these matters.

Finally, suggestions that we should undertake direct negotiations with the Sandinistas, if they simply talk to their internal political opponents, would place an undue burden on the weakest elements of the Nicaraguan opposition. Representatives of these internal groups, with their families and homes at risk and subject to direct Sandinista retribution, cannot be expected to speak for the concerns of the resistance.

A democratic reconciliation in Nicaragua is essential to regional peace. The United States has consistently offered to provide incentives to initiate such a dialogue—to include simultaneous bilateral talks with the Sandinistas. Conditioning our aid to the Nicaraguan resistance on the initiation of direct bilateral talks, without first requiring that the Sandinistas talk to their own internal opposition, would seriously undercut our friends in the region and prospects for a comprehensive, verifiable regional settlement. Our policy is, and should continue to be, to persuade the Sandinistas that they must come to terms with their own opposition and their neighbors.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, we hear criticism of the President's request for military assistance for the democratic resistance in Nicaragua because, critics say, we should instead be supporting the Contadora effort to achieve a negotiated solution. The rejection by the Sandinistas of further negotiations at the meeting of Foreign Ministers in Panama April 5–7 should have been sufficient evidence that the Sandinistas are not willing to negotiate.

Through countless debates we have heard that the United States is the obstacle to a negotiated settlement in Central America, that if we would only give Contadora a chance, we could have a diplomatic solution. Where is there evidence the Sandinistas really want to negotiate? Why would they even have to negotiate if they didn't face any opposition? The Sandinistas believe they can win on the battlefield without having to give up anything at the negotiating table. Well, let's have negotiations, but let's not give up our bargaining chips before we go to the bargaining table.

Our Western Hemisphere Subcommittee last week heard testimony from a witness who had just returned from Nicaragua and Honduras. He offered a compelling picture of Nicaraguans fighting to recapture a revolution they thought they had won in 1979 against Somoza only to be betrayed by the Communist Sandinistas. This witness, Bernie Aronson, a lifelong Democrat, said we should make no mistake about the democratic resistance. "They are not our puppets, they are not our proxies, they are not our creation," he said. They are fighting for something they believe in, not because of what we do in the United States.

Much of this debate has concentrated on charges by one side or another about the Contras and whether they deserve our help. Not enough attention has been paid to what the Contras are proposing.

On January 22, 1986, the directorate of the united Nicaraguan opposition supported by its permanent advisory committee proposed the principles and objectives of a provisional government of national reconciliation. Those principles and objectives follow:

I. REGARDING THE POLITICAL SYSTEM

First, to democratize Nicaragua, guaranteeing and promoting political pluralism and the participation of all citizens at the local and national level, through the exercise of representative democracy, respecting their ethnic, cultural, and religious values;

Second, to establish a political system which guarantees the separation and independence of the powers of the government;

Third, to establish a rule of law which assures the equality of the citizens before the law; respect for, the full exercise of, and effective development of human rights through the independence of the judicial power; giving guarantees to national human rights organizations, and adhering strictly to international obligations deriving from written agreements;

Fourth, to guarantee the strictest respect for freedoms, especially those of speech, association, worship, and unions with respect for agreements numbers 87 and 98 of the International Labor Organization, such as the undeniable right to strike;

Fifth, to recognize the primacy of civil society over the state and the achievement of the common good as its principal objective;

Sixth, to create an autonomous electoral system which guarantees representative democracy and respect for the popular will, freely expressed in periodic elections, assuring alternability in office, through the principle of non-reflection;

Seventh, to promulgate a civil service law, establishing the administrative career. There will be created the National Comptrollership Commission to guarantee the efficient and honest use of public funds and state resources;

Eighth, to abolish any and all types of capital punishment and to eliminate permanently and unequivocally the special tribunals which have been abusively created by the Sandinista front;

Ninth, to decree a general amnesty for political and related common crimes, as an expression of the process of rehabilitation and reconciliation, without exception;

Tenth, to recognize the historic rights of the indigenous peoples of Nicaragua, adopting special administrative and developmental measures in order to accelerate the progress of the Atlantic coast; fostering the participation of its peoples in matters affecting the region, preserving their cultural identity and strengthening the nationality and territorial integrity of the nation;

Eleventh, to demilitarize society by subjecting the military to the civil authority, proceeding to dismantle military, paramilitary and security organizations and the organizations of repressive nature of the Sandinista regime;

Twelfth, to create a national army in the service of the nation and the defense of its sovereignty, of adequate proportions for those objectives and composed principally of freedom fighters who wish to serve professionally and loyally in democratic institutions, and by other Nicaraguans who also meet the conditions of moral character. No person with a record of human rights violations will be able to become a part of the new national army.

II. SOCIO-ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

First, to recognize the family as the basis of society, making its protection a fundamental objective of the government of reconciliation;

Second, to give preferential use of state resources to satisfy basic human needs: Especially employment, food, health, education and housing;

Third, to assure that education responds to the fundamental principles of freedom of instruction and the right of parents to select the best for their children. The preservation and the development of culture and sports will be an important part of the programs of teaching, outreach and information;

Fourth, to carry out an integral agrarian reform, which responds to the natural right of private property, taking into account efficiency in the utilization of resources and the utility of giving land to those who work it;

Fifth, to establish a new social contract, democratically adopted, which recognizes the equitable participation of all sectors of civil society, both in effort as well as in benefits;

Sixth, to provide immediate assistance to the victims of the civil war, providing programs which permit their rehabilitation and economic security;

Seventh, to adopt measures which facilitate full participation in productive civilian life by combatants who do not join the new army and national police;

Eighth, to promote and facilitate the return of exiles through programs to finance the creation of jobs and the adoption of legal, economic and customs measures and other incentives;

Ninth, to formulate and execute an immediate program of action and the securing of resources for the reorder-ing and reactivation of the national economy and the providing of jobs for the Nicaraguan people;

Tenth, to abolish state centralism and return to the private sector all those productive, commercial and service activities which said sector is able to carry out more efficiently for the common good;

Eleventh, the government of reconciliation, as guarantor of the common good and social peace, will observe and promote the principles of: Social justice, freedom of association, work as a source of well-being and wealth, the indispensable contribution of laborers and peasants to the development of the country, as well as solidarity with the less favored sectors of the population, private property as the expression of a natural right and the sovereignty of Nicaragua over its natural resources;

Twelfth, to consolidate and perfect the Central American common market and to promote foreign investment as important measures to bring about socio-economic development.

III. FOREIGN POLICY

To adopt a foreign policy which protects the peace and strengthens the independence and sovereignty of the nation, founded on the principles of the inter-American system; supported in the fulfillment of international accords, cooperation and friendly relations, especially with those countries which practice representative democracy, and in the permanent determination to contribute to the economic, social, and political integration of the Central American fatherland.

IV. PLAN AND PROGRAM

A program of government will be presented for the consideration of a consultative body in which will be represented the various democratic, political, social, and labor organizations which will implement these principles. It will establish the procedures so that, by the 8th month after the installation of the new government of reconciliation, it will hold elections for a constituent assembly. After 18 months it will hold general elections with guarantees to assure the free participation of all citizens and the integrity of the elections.

Among the preferred objectives to be considered by the consultative body should be the following: Reorganization of the judicial power; municipal autonomy; reorganization and integrity of public administration; health and social security; education; culture; housing; transportation; infrastructure; sports; policies of incentives for the various productive sectors; the financial system; agrarian reform; commerce; foreign investment; reduction of the foreign debt; fiscal, monetary and credit policies, giving special attention to the development of cooperatives and the balanced action of the state.

We reiterate that the liberation of our fatherland requires the participation of all the democratic sectors of the Nicaraguan people, as well as the solidarity and support of the peoples and governments of the countries of the Americans and the other free peoples of the world.

At the same time, we pledge ourselves to respect the consensus of Nicaragua's democratic spectrum in the selection of those who will implement the initial task of national reconstruction. Furthermore, we pledge ourselves to assure that it shall be the people, by means of an electoral process in full enjoyment of their rights and freedoms, who will elect the constituent assembly and later the national authorities.

National reconciliation is an integral part of the Contadora process, yet the Sandinistas refuse to accept dialog with their opposition. President-elect Arias of Costa Rica has said that Contadora means agreeing to elements that imply "a political process of pluralistic democratization, which probably Nicaragua and those countries ideologically close to it are not disposed to accept. For this reason it is understandable that Nicaragua has adopted its present position of rejecting Contadora, after having approved of this mediation effort in the past for its international propaganda value—and to buy time."

A Costa Rican official, a favorite source for quotation by critics of the administration, has just said the Sandinistas have been participating in Contadora "for its international propaganda value—and to buy time." Now these critics say, we must buy more time, we must not pass military aid for the Contras, or we must at least make it more difficult to pass, so the Sandinistas can negotiate in Contadora. To those critics I say, heed the words of Bernie Aronson:

> The Sandinistas fought for 20 years to create a certain kind of society and it is not Costa Rica. They believe in what they are doing. They do not feel guilty they are suppressing those parties * * *. They are going to try to promote revolution elsewhere. There are 400 Costa Ricans fighting with the Sandinistas right now. What are they going to do when they go home? They are not fighting for Costa Rica * * * and I do not think we should kid ourselves about who those people are. They are Leninists and we have to deal with Leninists. They are not frustrated social democrats * * *. I would never say give military aid to the armed resistance for security alone. I really would not. I do not think we have a right to ask Nicaraguans to die for us. But I would say that if they want to stand up and complete their revolution, and they have a chance to do so, and I think they do, they have a right to do that; and if we are going to help, let's do it the right way. If not, let's end the tragedy. Let's end the killing.

I believe we do have to help the democratic resistance in Nicaragua, and we have to help them the right way. We must approve military aid to the Contras. I urge my colleagues to support the language of the resolution and reject all amendments to it.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7½ minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentleman very much for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of a new foreign policy in Central America and against the old failed policy of aid to the Contras. That new policy is embodied in the Hamilton amendment.

From Haiti to the Philippines to Libya, the issue of what makes a successful foreign policy is currently being debated in many parts of this country.

First, no policy can be successful unless it has the support of the American people, and by extension, bipartisan support in the Congress.

Why does aid to the Contras not enjoy wide support in this country? It is because the American people realize that the Contras kill indiscrimately, operate through a policy of terror, and have no real program for their country's future. Now, allegations have come out that the Contras are involved in drug trafficking in this country.

As a matter of fact, the largest cocaine bust on the west coast is tied to the Contras. Both the U.S. Congress and the administration have begun investigations into these allegations backing up their credibility. The President has already stated that drug traffickers do not deserve our support. I agree with the President on that. But I would like to go further. I say drug dealers deserve our contempt and certainly not our dollars.

Again and again, the American people have said they do not want us to aid the Contras. The latest CBS/New York Times poll shows only 25 percent of the American people support the President on aid to the Contras.

Then there is the question of support of the Contras by the Nicaraguan people. The United States cannot hope to influence events in another country by supporting a movement that does not have their support of that country's people. Let us learn from the example of the Philippines, where Mrs. Aquino clearly caught the Filipino people's imagination and was able to lead a bloodless transition of power. Contrast that with the 5 bloody years that the Contras have been fighting in Nicaragua, evidentally without the popular support they need, to be the domestic alternative the President imagines them to be. Pushing the Contras on an unwilling Nicaraguan people is doomed to fail miserably. The Nicaraguan people do not want another Somoza dictatorship and they know that the leadership of the Contras are former Somocistas.

Finally, we cannot possibly have a successful policy without the support of our friends and allies in the region. Recently, President Alfonsin of Argentina, a man who clearly knows the importance of diplomacy, echoed this same point when he said that only concerted pressure by its neighbors will cause the Sandinistas to change their policies. There is a sentiment among these neighbors for diplomacy and negotiation. There is no support for the Contra War—not publicly, not privately—there is no support. We are isolated in that regard.

The United States commands powerful influence, there is no doubt about that. So far we have used that influence to press a failed policy of armed conflict which has led the Congress to place restrictions on every Contra aid proposal that is sent up here. There are many who say this is no way to run a war. We hear that all the time and I agree. Let's not keep placing Band-Aids on the bloody wound. Let's cure the illness and move on to a new day with the Hamilton amendment.

To bring this new day about let us find one aspect of this Central America quagmire that everyone supports—all sides. That is the Contadora process. Full support of Contadora should be the centerpiece of our new bipartisan policy and it is the centerpiece of the Hamilton amendment.

I hope with all my heart the Congress ushers in the new day with the Hamilton amendment, but if we do not, I believe those of us who have fought against aid to the Contras will support the McCurdy amendment. McCurdy forces the military aid to be fenced for 90 days and then requires a vote of approval to release it. My friends, any amendment that will delay one death, one wound, one frightened child, deserves our support. Our choices are sometimes murky, but it is clear that McCurdy will at least delay the worst from happening right now.

Our choices are sometimes murky in this body, but it is clear that McCurdy will at least delay the worst from happening right now. And very important to all sides, very important, it keeps the control here in this Congress.

It buys us a little time for diplomacy, it keeps the control right here in the House.

My friends, whether you are Republican or Democrat, whether you are a moderate or a conservative or a liberal, we should keep the control of this war in this body and that is what McCurdy does. So vote yes on Hamilton, vote yes on McCurdy if Hamilton fails, and vote "no" on Michel.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. BOXER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, on what basis does the gentlewoman make the allegation that the Contras were involved in drug trafficking? Can she give names, dates, places?

Mrs. BOXER. I will be happy to do that. The gentleman should like to look back into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the last debate. I placed into that record the story that was in the San Francisco Examiner that was confirmed by court investigation. Those records are in court files and I would be glad to make those available.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Have there been any indictments or convictions? If so, what were the names of those people who were convicted?

Mrs. BOXER. Yes. We have that all for the gentleman. In fact, there was a conviction. What was very interesting was——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Was it a Contra?

Mrs. BOXER. If I may just complete my answer: These people were directly tied to the Contras. In fact, what happened which was so extraordinary was that the U.S. Department of Justice returned the funds to that particular party. I think the first time in history when a drug dealer got back the money once it was known the money was for the Contras.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentlewoman from California just referred to the case in California. It has been brought to my attention that the DEA confirms that the case referred to by Congresswoman BOXER involves a Colombian, Enrique Zavallos, who was a member of a Colombian drug ring. The DEA further confirms that the individual, Enrique Zavallos, later admitted to having lied about any connections with the Contras in Nicaragua, that he had only made up the story. This is confirmed by the DEA.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Ms. FIEDLER].

Ms. FIEDLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, we spend billions and billions of dollars on our national defense, and yet when there is a real threat in our own back yard, we refuse to acknowledge that it exists.

Now in just the past couple of days we have seen what happens when we recognize a threat. The threat in this case was Qadhafi's support of terrorism, and Congress saw the effectiveness with which the United States can respond when it is necessary.

After all, he armed, supported, and trained terrorists in another part of the world. Yet we see a situation taking place in Nicaragua with many of the same terrorist groups that are involved with Libya and some liberals propose that we do nothing to stop them.

The threat of terrorists working out of Nicaragua is compounded by a tremendous buildup of troops by the Sandinista government that did not exist prior to their taking over.

In 1979, there was only 16,000 troops in the country of Nicaragua; yet today, there are 120,000 troops there. The Soviet Union has invested, along with the Cubans, more than $500 million in military equipment for Nicaragua. They have provided military hardware in the form of tanks, artillery, helicopter gunships, patrol boats, a whole host of other things, to help work toward exporting terror in that part of the world. In Nicaragua we are dealing with the issue of the Sandinistas exporting terrorism to a neighboring country, El Salvador, which is trying to stabilize a democracy. They have also put their arms around and dealt closely with the PLO, the Libyans, the Iranians, all of whom comprise the greatest elements of opposition to the United States and its citizens. They all advocate World terror.

Terrorist activities are taking place within Nicaragua itself. They have slaughtered numerous Miskito Indians in Nicaragua; they have burned the only synagogue in Managua, and the entire Jewish community had to leave Nicaragua because it was no longer safe there. There is also a tremendous level of religious repression taking place there today.

These are the people who have control over the Nicaraguan Government. These are the same enemies that we were dealing with in Libya. And for this Government not to recognize the enormous threat that exists, not thousands and thousands of miles away from our shores, but right here in our hemisphere, is a terrible mistake for us and the American people. I urge this body to support aid for the Contras so that they can establish a democracy in Nicaragua, instead of permitting the continuing expansion of influence by the same terrorist groups we are dealing with in Libya.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, no one is more disturbed than I over the prospect of a Sandinista Communist regime in Nicaragua. Yet, I think I see as clearly as anyone the terrible dilemma that faces us as a Congress and we as a country.

The Contras are not a viable alternative to the Sandinistas. They have been at it for 5 years and they do not have a single beachhead inside Nicaragua. They have no popular uprising of support when they do go into Nicaragua. They are riddled with corruption. Their leadership is dominated by former Somocista national guardists.

So let us not kid ourselves. If we are going to rely on a military option in Central America, then there is no way that it is going to be successful unless it also includes the U.S. Armed Forces. And that is what the country clearly does not want. That is what the Congress does not want. Yet, we are slowly edging into it as we did in Vietnam, first with advisers, then with military training and, finally, it will include the entire U.S. Armed Forces.

So that is what is disturbing some of us who do not just jump through the hoop when the President says that there is a threat to our American security system coming from the Sandinistas. Of course, there is. But the question is: How do we deal with it?

I submit to you that the use of military options on a very limited basis through giving money to the Contras, both for military and humanitarian aid, is not a viable option in dealing with what is basically a political problem.

Let us take a little longer-range look at this thing. Suppose we wiped out the Sandinistas through some combination of U.S. Armed Force intervention and the Contras. That is not something new. For over 100 years, this country has on occasion invaded Nicaragua and set up regimes that we thought were more stable and more friendly to the United States. Each time we had to intervene again. The last one was the Somoza family. And what did it produce? It produced the Sandinista revolution.

Unless we address the basic underlying causes of instability in Central America, we are not going to solve this problem. You can knock off the Sandinistas and someone else will be back tomorrow.

So that brings us to the point that I really want to take a look at, which is the long-range problem that we are facing in Central America. I hope my Republican colleagues will think about this, as well as my Democratic colleagues.

We have lost the tax base to deal effectively in international affairs with any means except military means. We have lost our tax base through the unwise tax cuts that the President got the Congress to approve in 1981. We have now cut our domestic programs just about as far as we can safely go in order to finance the Presidents' increased defense spending. We have $200 billion a year deficits, and the Gramm-Rudman process that is forcing us to cut, cut, cut on both defense and democratic programs.

If we wanted a Marshall plan for Central America, if we wanted point 4, if we wanted another Alliance for Progress, we do not have the funds to do it. So all we have left now is the military option, and I submit to you that that is not going to solve the political, social, and economic problems which give rise to unrest in Central America, not only in Nicaragua, but throughout Central America, and South America as well.

That is what our friends in the Contadora countries and the other South American countries are trying to tell us, that if we have a program which is purely a military stick and no carrot of economic growth and development of the kind that will produce stability in Central America—and perhaps even provide a carrot for Nicaragua to moderate their dictatorial approach to their internal affairs—then we are not going to succeed in solving the problem of communism in Nicaragua or any other place in Central America.

So I suggest to you that we start taking a longer view. In the meantime, let us adopt the Hamilton amendment which sends a message that we are, in fact, going to do so. If that fails, we should at least adopt the McCurdy amendment that forces serious negotiations on both sides before Congress has to vote on the military option.

Beyond that, let us take a look down the road and figure out some way, whether through tax increases or some other means, to get ourselves in the position where we can start dealing with these Third World problems, the economic and social problems, and not just have the military option.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I just have a brief question. First of all, what period of time does the gentleman think we should wait for further negotiations? No. 2, if those negotiations are not fruitful, will the gentleman vote for military assistance?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I am trying to get across that we do need time to develop other options than military options.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman vote for military options if they do not work?

Mr. SEIBERLING. That will depend entirely on the circumstances at the time.

I do think that we ought to send a message very loud and clear to the Sandinista government, and to Cuba and the Soviets, that if the Contras aid is terminated, there are, nevertheless, limits to Sandinista actions which we will tolerate. Certainly we should not tolerate the introduction of any significantly higher levels of weapons in Nicaragua or military advisers or sophisticated weapons that could threaten neighboring countries. And we will not tolerate Sandinista military interventions outside of their borders. We can and should draw that line. That, in effect, was the original Contadora proposal.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield further, if they do not pay any attention, would the gentleman vote for military assistance?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Again, that will depend entirely on the circumstances.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell me what a viable force is? Is a viable force 3 weeks ago that was invaded by a huge Communist army when they invaded Honduras and attacked the freedom fighters' training camps, and the unviable force that you talked about kicked their tail in 2 days and sent them back across the border? Is that an unviable force?

Mr. SEIBERLING. If they could not defend their own base, I would say that they were not only not viable, they were practically nonexistent.

Mr. DELAY. I think they did defend their own base and kicked the Communists right back into Nicaragua.

Mr. SEIBERLING. But can they establish a base in Nicaragua? That is the Contra's objective.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in the well made mention of the erosion of the tax base and that, therefore, we cannot do some of the things we ought to be doing. I simply suggest that since 1980 and before 1985, Federal revenues have increased better than 40 percent, even with that tax reduction that we voted in 1981. The problem is that expenditures, mainly in the entitlement area, increased 62 percent during the same period of time.

As for our getting ourselves dragged down in a Vietnam situation, the conditions are completely different. We do not have military advisers in Nicaragua today. As a matter of fact, the gentleman opposed those military advisers in El Salvador, and it was the assistance of those military advisers that helped gain a free election in El Salvador, a neighboring country, and helped establish the kind of government, a pluralistic government, that we are striving for in Nicaragua.

So this business of getting ourselves in another Vietnam just does not hold water. We could, as a matter of fact, bar military advisers if that were our inclination, and we could certainly bar the introduction of American troops. That is the last thing the President would want to have happen; that has been made clear in any of the conversations that I have had with him.

At this juncture, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, all eyes are focused on Libya. With a near unanimous American voice supporting our actions there, it is wise at this juncture to consider the meaning of the Libyan-Nicaraguan link.

I have here a picture of Qadhafi of Libya and Ortega of Nicaragua, their fists raised together in solidarity, and this is the quote that appears underneath the picture of Mu'ammar Qadhafi: He says;

Libyan fighers, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground.

Those were the words of Col. Mu'ammar Qadhafi as reported in the New York Times on September 1, 1984.

I say to my colleagues that the link is both substantive and symbolic. There are deep and abiding commonalities between Qadhafi, his Libya, and Nicaragua's Leninist regime. It is essential that we understand fully this brotherhood because it implies something that opponents of Contra assistance have been unwilling to admit, that a Marxist-Soviet client, Nicaragua, poses a direct threat to the United States and its citizens.

The close relationship between the Sandinistas and Qadhafi creates the imminent danger of Libyan-inspired terrorism in this hemisphere against Americans. Consolidation of the Sandinistas' Leninist regime can only benefit Qadhafi and his sponsors and hurt America and Americans. Qadhafi's terrorists have a second home in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas and the Libyans are not just in the same league; they are on the same team. I repeat the quote of Colonel Qadhafi: "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground." In other words, the Libyans know exactly what is going on in Central America. None of us could have said it better. The Sandinistas are fighting the United States.

No, it is not an open war, but it is a war against democracy, a war against their neighbors, a war against human rights, a terrorist war in Colombia and El Salvador, and this threatens all of Central America and the entire hemisphere, and it jeopardizes American lives and security. The majority of Americans agree that Libya's Qadhafi deserved punishment, and they approved the President's action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, on this Contra aid issue so many Members of this House are not willing to support the action, not of American troops, not of the American Air Force or the U.S. Navy as they did in Libya, but the actions of others who would fight for their freedom against a destabilizing threat, a hostile threat, right south of our borders from the Sandinistas.

Let us consider the evidence of the Libyan-Nicaraguan connection, the terrorism, the anti-American activities, the democracy bashing, the suppression of human rights, the arms traffic. The facts are that four Libyan planeloads of Soviet-manufactured arms were intercepted in Brazil, and all in all there were 84 tons of arms labeled as medical supplies. Libyan loans in the amount of $400 million have reach the Sandinistas. That is four times the amount that we cannot get, because of this Congress, to our friends who are fighting for freedom in that region. We hear of Sandinista celebrations honoring the Qadhafi takeover of Libya and the ousting of U.S. military bases in Libya, and you can go through the quotes reflecting solidarity among Qadhafi and his colleagues.

We know that Libyan military officers are advising and fighting inside Nicaragua with the Sandinistas. Libya has repeatedly propped up the Nicaraguan economy with tens of millions of dollars in oil loans. The Libyans and the Sandinistas are in this together. They see this as a war.

Surrender is not a viable alternative. The best alternative is to support those who would fight for their own freedom. Again before we vote, let us remember Qadhafi's words, the words underneath this picture, with Qadhafi's fist raised in solidarity with Daniel Ortega, the President of Communist Nicaragua:

Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, we have just heard a discussion about the link between Libya and Nicaragua. I think the recent events in Libya underscore why American policy or administration policy in Nicaragua is wrong, not right.

There are two fundamental differences between our policy in Libya and our policy in Nicaragua. What are we on this side urging the administration to do before we commit to a military solution in Nicaragua? The very thing they have done in Libya. What did the administration do before it took military action? We have known what Qadhafi has been doing for a year, but we first tried diplomacy and we tried economic measures. We tried them for 6 months, 8 months, 10 months, and a year. It was only after those methods failed that we then had to resort, with no other choice before us, to the ultimate military force.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHUMER. I will yield after I finish my remarks to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Chairman, there is a world of difference here. Why cannot we try diplomacy first in Nicaragua? Why can we not listen to the Contadora nations and the surrounding countries who have, if anything, more to lose than we?

Let me ask the gentleman a rhetorical question. That is this: Why is it that the American people have supported the President in Libya overwhelmingly and yet, by a CBS-New York Times poll just recently given-out, have rejected his policy in Nicaragua? For one simple reason: They are convinced that we tried diplomacy and it failed in Libya. Everywhere you go, people say: "I didn't like to see us have to do it, but it was a last resort."

There is a second major difference. The day Daniel Ortega trains terrorist hit squads to assassinate Americans in Nicaragua or outside Nicaragua, you can be sure that the kind of bipartisan support the President has received on Libya will be received on Nicaragua. The difference in the argument is that what is going on in Nicaragua is an internal struggle. Qadhafi did not just get into power this year. He has been doing his evil things within Libya not just for a year but for 5 years, for 8 years.

And yet 2 years ago or 3 years ago did our President say that we should interfere in Liyba no matter how evil the Libyan Government was? No. It was only when the Libyan regime declared war on Americans in Germany, in Italy, in Egypt and in Sudan—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his kindness.

It was only when he began a terrorist war against Americans outside of Libya that we intervened and only after the use of diplomacy.

I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that indeed the bipartisan support in this House that the President has received for his Libyan policies, and furthermore the overwhelming degree of backing he has received for his Libyan policies among the American people, are founded with very good reason, that first, in Libya indeed military policy has been a last resort. In Nicaragua it seems to be the first resort.

Second, that Libya no matter how badly internally its policies are is seeking to export its terror to Americans throughout the world. Those are two major differences and differences that I believe stand the test politically, issuewise and morally, and that is why I would urge support in this House for the Hamilton provision and the McCurdy provision.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHUMER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, how does the gentleman explain the walkout of the Communist Sandinistas from the Contadora talks recently and is the gentleman aware there have been nine times in the past 2 years that we have made overtures to the Nicaragua government to negotiate.

Mr. SCHUMER. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that the negotiations that the President has tried cannot be tried at the same time we are aiding a military force.

I think in this country if some foreign power were trying to overthrow our government and then said, "Let's sit down and negotiate," we would resist doing that. Let us do one and then the other.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If the gentleman from New York had his facts straight, I would agree with him, but the fact is that aid to the Contras was cut off entirely, not just military aid, but humanitarian aid, any kind of aid was cut off entirely for a period of 16 months and then some humanitarian aid started coming in there and there were many negotiations plus many attempts at negotiations.

Let me read from a letter that Congressman BROOMFIELD just received from Secretary of State Shultz:

> During nine rounds of bilateral negotations in 1984 the Sandinistas rejected our offer of bilateral assurances in exchange for a workable Contadora agreement. By the ninth round in December 1984, the Sandinista position was very clear. They were using the Manzanillo talks with us as an excuse to refuse to conduct any substantive negotiations with the other countries of Central America. In addition, the Sandinistas sought to create distrust of the United States by telling the Central American democracies that the United States was making a deal behind their backs.

The gentleman from New York said that if—another caveat of his—that if it could be shown that the Sandinistas were training terrorists for the export of revolution, he would support military assistance.

Well, the facts are clear. M-19, the Colombian terrorist group, is active inside Nicaragua. Thomas Borge held a special mass for the deceased M-19 guerrillas who were killed in their massive assault on the Palace of Justice in Columbia. There is an intimate link between the Sandinistas and those terrorists.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague for yielding.

It never ceases to amaze me, Mr. Speaker, how my colleagues on the other side of the aisle seem to be consumed with disinformation emanating from Nicaragua.

There is a book out that has been published by the State Department and it is a complete dissertation by Mr. Alvaro Baldizon who was the right-hand man of Thomas Borge, the Minister of the Interior in Nicaragua. In this book he talks about the disinformation tactics of the Communist Sandinista government. He talks about how when visiting delegations, particularly religious delegations go down there, they go into Borge's office, which has a crucifix, a picture of Jesus Christ, and a Bible on his desk, and he talks in religious terms to confuse them and to deceive them into thinking that his is a Christian and humanitarian type government. He even brings in poor peasants who may have been mistreated and promises them, with the door open so that these visiting dignitaries can hear, aid and assistance and then he goes out and very humbly apologizes for keeping these people waiting.

Disinformation is one of the major tactics that the Communists are using in Nicaragua and elsewhere in the world.

In addition to that, you talk about drug trafficking, Mr. Borge, according to Baldizon, his former right-hand man, is directly involved in drug trafficking, unlike the case that the Representative from California [Mrs. BOXER] talked about a few minutes ago. What the gentlewoman talked about was more Communist disinformation.

The man who made the allegations that the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] referred to, Mr. Zavallos, later said to the DEA that he lied, that he lied, and yet on this floor a few moments ago one of my colleagues was stating this false information as fact.

Is it any wonder that the American people do not know who to believe? Is it any wonder that the American people do not know whether or not we should support the freedom fighters down there, because they are getting a steady diet of Communist disinformation.

The law firm of Reichler & Applebaum here in Washington, DC, who was paid $320,000 by the Communist Sandinista government last year that commissioned a human rights study to make the Sandinistas look better, which was later published by the Washington office on Latin American affairs, which one of my colleagues, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON] supported at a news conference here on Capitol Hill was total Communist disinformation. There is no question about that, and yet on CBS news and other networks around this country that document was reported as fact. It was never refuted.

Now, how is it that the American people are supposed to understand this issue clearly when Communist disinformation has been fed to them as a steady diet? It concerns me a great deal and I am sure it concerns my colleagues.

The previous speaker up here talked about Mr. Qadhafi. Mr. Qadhafi said that he supports the Communist Sandinistas as brothers and gave them massive amounts of aid because they fight America on our own ground. That ought to tell us something. It ought to tell us that the Communist Sandinistas with the support from Qadhafi and the Soviet Union intend to crush all internal opposition and if we do not give the freedom fighters the aid that they need, they will crush them, make no mistake about that. They will then consolidate power and export revolution rapidly throughout Central America. They will build a massive army that will be on our southern flank, the 2,000-mile border between us and Mexico.

My colleagues, at some point in the future we are going to have to face that massive military power if we do not deal with the problem today.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is doing a superb job on this whole question of Central America.

We are talking here somewhat about the quality of information and as long as we are on the question of the quality of information being given to us on the House floor, I have to confess some puzzlement that we are debating anything at all, because on March 20 the distinguished minority leader, who is here, got up on the floor and he said:

> To those of you gazing longingly at the April 15th vote, the escape hatch offered by the Speaker, let me tell you what a national security expert told me yesterday. He said, "Bob, if you lose that vote tomorrow, Nicaragua is gone. A month from now will be too late, because the Communists are even now mobilizing for an offensive."

So I have to wonder if the minority leader was correct a month ago what we are voting on, because if Nicaragua is gone, what have we got left here? That is an example I think of the kind of problems we are getting with information.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. MICHEL. Well, it is not uncommon for those of us on the floor to quote individuals, those who are supposed to be experts. He was only one. He was not the ultimate. He was not the head of his department. He was one.

I was simply quoting him to make a point, as the gentleman from Massachusetts quoted at the time whomever he thinks is appropriate. I did not say that was my personal view.

Mr. FRANK. I have to take my time back, because the gentleman from Illinois is misstating it right now. The gentleman did say quite clearly in the context that that was his personal view. The only person I am quoting right now is the gentleman from Illinois. He did not get up and say here is one expert out of several. He got up and he said: "To those of you gazing longingly, let me tell you."

He clearly intended to say, "Don't vote for it because Nicaragua will be gone."

Well, it is not gone and that is an example of the kind of information we are getting.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. Yes, I will yield again to the minority leader.

Mr. MICHEL. Well, the gentleman would have to concede that just a few days thereafter there was a serious incursion onto the borders beyond in Honduras by the Sandinistas. That is a very serious kind of thing.

Mr. FRANK. I do not "concede it." I will take back my time. The gentleman wants to get off the point. I do not "concede it." I concede something if I have done something wrong.

I mentioned the fact, yes, it happened, but the gentleman said that if we did not do this on March 20, Nicaragua would be gone. I think that is an example of the inaccurate hyperbole we are being given.

Now, I want to talk a little bit about the Libyan connection. There was an inconsistency and hypocrisy and lack of central rationale in the administration's position on this that is striking. You talk about funding a war against Nicaragua because Qadhafi was friendly with the Sandinistas. The Saudi Arabians have been good friends of the Libyans. They have given them help. And what are we doing with the Saudi Arabians? We are sending weapons over there, but for them to use to shoot other people.

We have been told that negotiations have not worked partly because this administration, incredibly and hypocritically, has included in the list of things to be negotiated internal reforms to Nicaragua.

Now, I am for human rights and we should make our point about human rights clear, but let us be consistent once again. We are told that the Nicaraguans mistreat people in the Roman Catholic Church, and they do and that is something to be deplored and something we should work against; but you know, in Ronald Reagan's great friendly country, the People's Republic of China, they do not mistreat any Catholic prelates. Do you know why? They ran them all out. The do not allow them in there. They have outlawed the Roman Catholic Church in the People's Republic of China. There is no Cardinal, like Cardinal Obando in there to be harassed, because they will not let him in. They set up there own Catholic Church, a pseudo-Catholic Church.

And what are we doing to the People's Republic of China? We are sending them weapons to shoot other people.

Now we are told that they are not very good to Jews in Nicaragua. I think there have been some anti-Semitic outbursts, but I would rather be a Jew in Managua than a Jew in Riad in Saudi Arabia, and we are sending them money.

There is an inconsistency and a lack of coherent rationale in this that is striking.

One reason that negotiations have not succeeded is that Ronald Reagan has suddenly pretended that he is the Paladin of civil liberties. He is the 911 of free speech. Somebody is not letting a newspaper be published, call Ronald Reagan. Here comes a hundred million bucks to a country that is gone, according to the minority leader, a hundred million bucks being thrown in a hole. Rand McNally has probably taken the map back and we are being told that that is why negotiations will not succeed.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman concede that maybe the reason the freedom fighters continue to flourish is because they are tenacious and because they are patriotic and they want to hang in there no matter what the cost and maybe we have not given them enough credit, maybe they are going to hang in there as long as possible to defend their liberty?

Mr. FRANK. Well, I will take back my time now to say, in the first place, I am not "conceding" that they are patriotic and tenacious. People keep asking me to "concede" things. I do not concede facts unless they are something unpleasant to me.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FRANK. No, I have taken back my time. I have yielded three times in a short period of time here.

I want to say to the gentleman that I was not talking about the quality of whether or not they are patriotic or not patriotic. I am talking about American policies.

I will ask the gentleman to stop interrupting me. I have yielded for the third time in a short period of 5 minutes. I am trying to respond to the gentleman's comments and the gentleman ought not to be interrupting.

The point is simply this, we do not decide to send hundreds of millions of American dollars to get people killed based on other people's patriotism or lack of it.

I supported what we did in Libya. I thought that was a rational use of American force with a sensible moral and strategic rationale. Quite distinct from Nicaragua; but even there, innocent people, tragically, were killed.

What we are talking about in Nicaragua is not just pushing pieces on a chess board. We are talking about taking American tax dollars to help people kill each other and I do not think we ought to do that as a matter of national policy without a lot stronger moral and strategic rationale.

The patriotism of a particular group—there are patriotic people all over the world who would like to kill each other. That is not in my judgment a reason for giving American funds there.

The reasons being, the human rights reason, is nonsense. Ronald Reagan had to be dragged, lamenting, kicking and screaming, away from Ferdinand Marcos. He called one of the most fraudulent elections of our times a show of strength of the two-party systems.

When he turns around and says to the Nicaraguans, "Let us negotiate free elections," of course, those negotiations are not going anywhere.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I will take my 15 seconds. The gentleman is running out of time.

Mr. FRANK. I do not know why the gentleman was standing up, but I apologize for yielding to him when he did not want to be yielded to.

If there is a threat to the strategic interests of the United States, then we use force. I do not think that these 3 million people in that poor, unorganized country, threaten our security. There is a national consensus——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman concede——

Mr. FRANK. The gentleman has himself confused with a yo-yo. I say I will yield and he says "No." Then when I start talking, he interrupts me again. No, I will not yield to the gentleman.

The point is this: We have had a national consensus here that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] helped formulate. We are prepared to say that we will interdict arms, we will protect any other country against a possible attack, but to pretend that Ronald Reagan is the 911 of civil liberties and that he is so offended by the lack of democracy in Nicaragua that he is going to send these people in there to help kill each other is nonsense. It does not represent a threat to the United States.

Libya is an instructive difference. That was a rational use of American force. This is an irrational one, it is not morally justified, and I hope that the Hamilton amendment passes, and if not, the McCurdy amendment.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] for a response.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, after all of the rhetoric, fact No. 1: The Soviet Union in spades is supporting the Communist Government of Nicaragua and giving them massive military support. The PLO is supporting them. The Libyans are supporting them. All the Communist fellow travelers are supporting them. They are suppressing their people. The human rights violations that the gentleman talked about are legion and the freedom fighters are asking and pleading and crying for our support.

I think people fighting for their freedom deserve it, and that ought to put to rest the statements by my colleague who preceded me.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should state from the outset here, we talked about patriotism here a minute ago, that everybody engaged in this debate on the House floor is a patriotic American and we ought to understand that we are all coming at these issues from a position of good will.

What is questioned in many instances is the judgment that people bring to these matters affecting our own national security, because the question that we have before us is: What is the real nature of the Communist movement in Central America, and in particular in Nicaragua?

We got some hints of that. The person who was put on television by the Democratic Party in opposition to the President's policy said this:

> We agree that the Sandinista government has betrayed the promise of its own revolution, has suppressed the freedom of its own people, and has supported subversion against its neighbor, El Salvador.

There is agreement by the Democratic Party that that is the nature of communism in Central America today, particularly in Nicaragua.

What has the chairman of the subcommittee related to Central America said about this? In a report to this body, he said:

> There is no question but that the Nicaraguan government has contributed to regional tension in Central America. It has channeled assistance to other revolutionary movements, especially the guerrilla movement in El Salvador, and has staged its own rapid military buildup with Cuban and Soviet support.

In other words, in that document, we admit that there is Cuban and Soviet involvement in the Nicaraguan Communist movement in Central America.

The New York Times, that has hardly been a supporter of the President's policies, has said this, and I quote:

> The Sandinista junta has meddled in its neighbors' affairs and complicated the region's security problems. With Soviet-bloc help, it has built the biggest military airfield in Central America and is building a deepwater port in the Caribbean. Managua is plainly encouraging guerrilla comrades in El Salvador, and more than piety explains why Tomas Borge, the Interior Minister, participated in a mass for the M-19 guerrillas who shot up the Palace of Justice in Bogota, Colombia.

That is the nature of the Communist movement in Nicaragua. Now, the question then before us is: What are we going to do about it? Are we going to sit here and blithely say that we are going to simply negotiate? I will tell my colleagues what the Secretary of State said the other day about negotiations. He said negotiation in this context is the same as capitulation.

Why did he say that? Because the negotiation process, the Contadora process, as constantly referred to on this floor, broke down the other day. Why? Because the Sandinistas walked out. Why did they walk out? Because they were not about to come to an agreement; because what they want is time, time in order to put together their totalitarian regime in such a way that they cannot be removed from power.

That is what the side that talks about negotiation is really talking about. They are talking about a policy of appeasement. They are talking about a policy of capitulation. I submit to my colleagues that that kind of judgment is a danger to our national security.

It seems to me, then, that our choice is clear. We have a choice of either doing something to help bring freedom to Nicaragua or to support dictatorship in Nicaragua. We have a choice of standing up to the Communist expansionism in Central America or capitulating to Communist aggression in Central America.

We should stand firm in this body. We should stand firm for freedom. We should stand firmly against communism.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS].

Mr. STUDDS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, when the House voted last month to reject the President's $100 million aid request, the President called it "a dark day for freedom." The Democratic leaders of Latin America called it an opportunity for peace.

Last Thursday, I introduced a resolution that, if enacted, would declare a state of war between the United States and Nicaragua. I do not support a policy of war, but this Congress will commit an act of war if the President's plan to aid the Contras is approved.

A resolution to declare war frames the real issue more clearly and more fairly than any of the legislative options we will consider today.

The central question, after all, is whether the United States should support with weapons, money, and military advisers the violent overthrow of a government with whom we purport to be at peace. Although the United States intervention in Nicaragua began more than 4 years ago, our Government has provided no explicit answer to this question. As a result, we have a policy that puts little military pressure on Nicaragua, while it squanders our ability to encourage change by other means.

The primary victims of this indecision are the people of Nicaragua—all of them, Contra, Sandinista, and, perhaps most tragically, those in the middle, the unlabeled majority.

The administration has invited the people of Nicaragua to rebel violently against their government; but because this invitation does not have the backing of the American people, it is a trap, an invitation only to suffer and die.

President Reagan's war has encouraged the worst instincts and strengthened the most extreme elements within the Sandinista government; it has cast suspicion and restricted the options of those seeking nonviolent means of effecting change.

Mr. Chairman, the people of Nicaragua did not elect the Members of this Congress; they have not asked us to select their leaders; they have done nothing to deserve this war.

Our Government should stand with the American people, with the Democrats of Central and South America, with the independent labor unions, with the church, and with Nicaragua's own internal political opposition in support of law, justice, and freedom, not only in Nicaragua but throughout the hemisphere. Today, as a result of this administration, our Government stands isolated, accompanied only by the Contras, supporting an undeclared war in which we cannot with honor participate, and which we cannot win.

We have, in recent days, taken a strong stand against state-sponsored international terrorism. Let us live up to that position not only in what we ask others to do, but in what we ask of ourselves. Violence is not the solution to the crisis in Central America; freedom will not be served by a replay, albeit in slow motion, of the Bay of Pigs.

Our policy toward Nicaragua can be saved. It can be made to work. But first, it must be changed. I hope Members will support the Hamilton substitute; support, if that fails, the McCurdy amendment. Let us begin again, this time with the full backing of the American people; and with the active cooperation of our Latin allies; let us, for once, hold out to the people of Nicaragua the promise of a better future, instead of reminding them, as we have for 5 years, of their own bitter past.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STUDDS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just have one question, and that is: If negotiations do not work, if the gentleman's position prevails and negotiations do not work, will the gentleman vote for military assistance down the road for the freedom fighters?

Mr. STUDDS. The gentleman persists in asking hypothetical questions. I do not understand how now, or in any hypothetical situation the gentleman would conjure in his wildest imagination, he thinks that the people of any Latin country will rally behind the United States and the CIA after 80-some years of history of intervention in this century.

Even if desirable, which I do not grant the gentleman, the bottom line is that in addition to being illegal, it will not work.

Mr. DeLAY. Mr. Chairman, already some of my colleagues have once again found themselves in the dark with the boogyman—Vietnam. Out of fear they raise this spector—and hope that many of us will shy away, fearing the old wounds of a war we would all like to forget. Well, let me take a stab at plugging in their nightlight, and showing them how to make the boogyman go away.

The question is asked—are there parallels between our efforts in Central America and Vietnam? The answer is "Yes." The next question, logically, is—will we continue to go down the same road we did in Vietnam? The answer—we don't have to.

We can choose another road by changing the fundamental factor which drew us into the slow spiral of a defensive war that cost us many lives and our self-respect. That factor is U.S. resolve. The resolve to make a commitment to act in the national interest. The resolve to do what we can now with indiginous forces to preclude having to commit forces later if at all possible.

In Vietnam our resolve from the outset was weak and wavering. We only aided the South Vietnamese in fits and starts through years of debate and discussion—meanwhile the North Vietnamese organized and mobilized—and we continued to debate and discuss. Though strategic United States interests were at stake, we could not find the resolve to say—we must do everything in our power to ensure that the South Vietnamese people would be ready and able to defend themselves—to win a war against the North. Instead we flip-flopped slowly drawing ourselves into a long drawnout war, where our lack of resolve continued to haunt us.

In Nicaragua, there is an opposition force of over 20,000—more than the Sandinistas had when they set out to overthrow Somoza—20,000 against a Sandinsta army built by physically forced recruitment and supported by Libya, the PLO, the Soviet Union, Cuba, Bulgaria—and the list goes on.

Yes, my friends, we can all feel the Vietnam boogyman's presence and, yes, he is scary. But do we once again cower in the corner waiting for events to take their own course. Hoping that things will turn out favorably for our country—merely hoping that we can avoid sending our own troops to fight—finding some resolve so late that it's too late? Or does this Congress reach deep within itself and find the resolve to make a commitment of support to indigenous forces who want to take back their country before it's lost to Cuba and the Soviet Union. Do we once again send a message to the world that the United States can't make up its mind to help those who would kick out of their country those who are bent on destabilizing the West—a band of international thugs brutally oppressing a nation? Or do we say that our resolve to defend American interests does not stop on the shores of Libya? Will we tell the world that when we see a threat, no boogyman is scary enough to paralyze the Congress of the United States? I hope so. If we find this resolve—Vietnam will fade into the past. We now have a chance to make it a memory—let's not let fear cause it to once again be a reality.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Chairman, only a few short weeks ago this body voted down aid to the Contras. That was the correct vote then. It is the correct vote today. Nothing has changed.

Shortly after our vote, the Nicaraguan Army entered Honduras in hot pursuit of Contra forces. This was publicized as an unusual occurrence, and as a threat to Honduras. It was an event that has occurred at least 100 times in the past, and apparently the Hondurans did not see it as a major threat to themselves until we convinced them to let us move Honduran forces close to the border to defend Honduras.

Let us try to be somewhat objective about this latest event. The Contra bases are in Honduras. The Contras are working actively to overthrow the Sandinista government. What government, including ours, perceiving itself to be under attack would not pursue its attacker all the way to the attacker's home base wherever that base might be? As our incursion into Libya makes amply clear, we will not hesitate to cross our own borders in order to defend ourselves. Other countries do not hesitate to do likewise. While we may not like the Sandinista government, we should not expect it to act differently than we and our allies would and do act when attacked.

The question we still must face is this: What is that $100 million in aid going to win for us? The answer is nothing. It will not lead to the overthrow of the Sandinistas. It will lead to a continuation of fighting, a continuation of death and destruction in a country so desperately poor that it is a travesty to use that money to promote an arms buildup on both sides. And we know that will happen. As long as the Sandinistas are under attack, its allies will be able to justify more and better weapons. We will do the same for our proxies. if we want to spend $100 million on Nicaragua, let's do it to benefit the people directly, not to purchase armaments.

Let us send that money to Haiti where it will do some good.

Let us again vote down military aid to the Contras.

Let us support the Hamilton amendment.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYMALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to make sure I understood the gentleman's last statement that he made, that we should be giving $100 million in economic aid to the Sandinista government to help the people down there?

Mr. DYMALLY. No, to Haiti.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. To Haiti?

Mr. DYMALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I am sorry. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] has 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, at this point in the debate, I would like to take a few moments to consider the nature of revolution. Here is an idea, a word, revolution, that is so often used—and almost as much it is misused.

The sad fact that history teaches us is that the vast majority of those political upheavals that have been called by the name of revolution have in fact subverted the very liberties they were intended to establish. If there is one thing we must learn from this tragic record it is this: A political process that results merely in the exchange of one form of tyranny for another is not revolutionary—it is reactionary.

I have often pointed out that the great irony of communism is the fact that Communists are always interested in sponsoring so-called revolutions against everything except the most reactionary model for political, social, and economic development that the human mind has ever devised; namely, communism itself.

And that leads me to the pathetic spectacle that is Nicaragua. The pattern has repeated itself so many times in so many countries that I wonder how we can possibly keep missing it.

In 1979, Nicaragua experienced what has been called a revolution. What really happened is that a gang of cutthroats incorporated the name of an authentic Nicaraguan hero; they next adopted the language of our own Founding Fathers; And they finally succeeded in mobilizing public opposition to a decaying and corrupt regime whose political effectiveness had long since been exhausted. With a timely shove from the United States, bolstered by international public opinion, the Somoza regime was out—and suddenly the Sandinistas were in!

A revolution it was called! A cynical betrayal it soon became.

We all remember the solemn promises the Sandinistas made in 1979, the commitments made to the OAS and to the United States:

Free and fair elections.

A mixed economy with opportunity for individual enterprises and advancement.

A pluralistic society with respect for freedom of religion, association, and expression; and

An impartial and orderly judicial system.

That is what the Sandinistas promised. What they produced is what these so-called revolutions always produce:

Broken promises.

A shattered economy.

Political repression on a scale previously unknown in Nicaragua.

Expanding prisons; and, oh yes, waves of refugees.

The revelations made by Alvaro Baldizon, Arturo Cruz, and other defectors who had inside knowledge of the inner workings of the Sandinista regime add up to a striking group portrait of men who are desperately clinging to power and living in fear of the very people that they ostensibly liberated. So complete has been the failure of the Sandinista revolution within Nicaragua itself that its leaders soon turned their attention outward to the neighboring countries.

"This revolution goes beyond our borders"—so declared Tomas Borge in 1981 as he and his cohorts moved to subvert the neighboring countries. Only by spreading revolution Sandinista-style—uninvited, unwanted, and undemocratic—could the Sandinistas find reason enough to justify continuing their disgusting regime.

Mr. Chairman, If Tomas Borge can proclaim a revolution beyond the borders of Nicaragua—if the principles of Sandinismo are truly international in scope—why cannot we help the Nicaraguan people reclaim their own revolution? Why cannot we help them bring to completion the revolution they thought they had achieved in 1979?

The choice before us is whether we are willing to accept as a permanent fact of life a demented parody of those ideals for which the Nicaraguan people fought and bled in 1979—or whether we will stand with them in their hour of need, helping them to reclaim their own revolution.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, today, the House continues its debate on U.S. policy for Central America. Three weeks ago, the House made the decision to take the extra time to resolve this issue properly. I voted no then because I firmly believe we must find legislatively a time for negotiation.

Options and choices are now before us.

What is decided now will serve as the foundation for an essential long term policy in Central America.

All of us share a common goal: To nurture democracy and independence in a region which has long known only dictatorship and indifference. As secretary Shultz has commented, the consequences of our inaction are simply too great—the price of failure too high—for this Congress not to follow the right road.

Before the last vote, I met with President Duarte at his office in San Salvador. "People who have lived under a dictatorship," He said, "need an opportunity to fully appreciate liberty. I want to prove," President Duarte continued, "that a democratic revolution is better than a Communist revolution."

Our challenge in this Congress is to support a program that gives democracy a chance.

I have consistently said I would support aid to the Contras. I have consistently said I see the need for a fenced-in period of negotiation. I have consistently said the United States should strive toward a Central American policy.

It would be a tragedy not to support the positive trend toward democracy throughout Central America.

While I understand the honorable motives behind the other amendments being offered, our actions must send a clear signal. A second vote in a few weeks is no substitute for a decision today. It is important that we display our support. More conditions will only send a confused message that Congress cannot make up its mind.

If we want to provide a little breathing room for those fragile democracies in El Salvador and Honduras, Congress must send a signal to the Sandinistas.

If their response is indifference, the Senate proposal is equally clear. The United States will support a program to promote Central American independence through appropriate assistance to the Nicaraguan resistance.

The Senate proposal meets the conditions I outlined in my report after my own visit to Central America I will support the Senate proposal.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished friend from Maryland for yielding the time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we face today one of the most important series of votes that we are going to cast in this Congress. These votes are about nothing less than whether our Nation will continue down the road of escalation in Central America that the administration has laid out for us, or whether we are going to give diplomacy a real try.

The administration has charted its road very clearly. This road leads to an ever-larger Contra army, and it leads, in my judgment, to eventual United States intervention if the Sandinistas do not, as the President has said, cry uncle. This road leads to a war that will serve no one's interests.

As a Contadora negotiator told me just last week, the approval by Congress of the $100 million for the Contras will lead to "nothing positive; only havoc and chaos."

Later today, our universally respected colleague from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON], the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee, will offer an alternative that would take our Nation down another road, a road toward diplomatic settlement, a road toward stability in our region rather than chaos in our region.

We are not just debating $100 million in aid. We are debating the entire direction of our Central American policy. We are debating whether we will continue to pursue policies that have failed to bring peace and stability to Central America, failed to slow Nicaragua's military buildup, failed to slow its movement into the Soviet-Cuban camp, failed to induce the Sandinistas to open up their political system; or whether we will adopt new policies, new policies that have, we are told, by all of our friends in the hemisphere, a better chance of working. We are being asked today to kid ourselves. Basically, we are being asked to suspend judgment, to pretend that voting for this joint resolution providing for $100 million to the Contras will accomplish something positive.

But I believe, I really believe that we know better. My colleague, we cannot escape responsibility for the fact that we know better. We know that this $100 million, or whatever it turns out to be because the resolution, if adopted, will suspend the restriction on the use of other funds, so we do not know how much money we are talking about, but whatever it ends up being, we know that it is not going to accomplish anything. We know that 18 months from now the administration is going to be back asking for more, just another $100 million, or just another $200 million, or $500 million to, as they will tell us again, draw the Sandinistas to the negotiating table.

But we know that this policy is not going to produce negotiation. We are told that by the negotiators. That is not the intent of this policy, and that will not be its effect.

The idea that by financing the Contras we will ever get the Sandinistas to sit down with Somoza's national guard and agree to give power back to them is, we are told by our friends in the hemisphere, ludicrous. It cannot happen. We know that.

If that is what we want, to get the Sandinistas out of power, we are going to have to accomplish that with the use of American troops. We know that this policy makes reconciliation in Nicaragua less likely. It makes concessions by the Sandinistas less likely, because they do not want to be seen to be giving into externally supported aggression. That message has been told to us loud and clear by the negotiators themselves, the very people who are trying to pursue an alternative to war. And it makes concessions, I would argue, by the opposition, the Nicaraguan opposition, less likely because they will continue to hope that the United States Armed Forces will eventually install them in power.

We know that this policy is a failure. The record is clear. Five years of this policy have produced more repression, have produced more polarization, more censorship, more human rights violations, more attacks on the church, more military buildup, more Cuban advisers, more of everything in Nicaragua that the administration says that the policy is supposed to prevent.

We know also, I would argue, everybody here knows Nicaragua is not 10 feet tall. We know that our rejection of this request is not going to lead to the fall of Mexico and the end of freedom in the Americas.

Nicaragua is a tiny country of 3 million people, about half the population of our State of Maryland, with an inept government and a bankrupt economy. The United States does not have to be afraid of Nicaragua. In cooperation with our many friends in Latin America who have more at stake in this than we do, we can clearly deal with Nicaragua; and our friends confirm that when we talk with them.

We can ensure that the Soviets do not base missiles or submarines in Nicaragua. The Contras do not have the power to do that, by the way, but we do. We can ensure that Nicaragua does not take over other countries. The Contras cannot ensure that, but if we and our friends follow the right policies, we can ensure that.

We know that we are isolated from Latin America on this issue. This is an irony here. A policy intended to isolate Nicaragua has instead isolated the United States. The Latin American democracies do not support this policy. They tell us that there is a better way, and it is through the diplomatic process that they have been working at over these many months.

We know that this policy is not an alternative to intervention or withdrawal, as the administration claims. On the contrary, it makes either intervention or withdrawal inevitable. We know that the only way to avoid having to face that cruel choice is to abandon this failed policy and go to an alternative that does serve the national interests of the United States.

My colleagues, I suggest to you that we all really know when we stop to think about it that these things are true. Acting on that knowledge, I concede, will be difficult today. We will be attacked by the administration, we will be attacked by the right wing; but when we were elected, and when we took our oaths of office on the floor of this House, we acquired responsibilities; and one of the most awesome of those responsibilities is to cast the tough votes when we know the national interest of our Nation demands it.

I ask you to join with me, to join with the majority of the American people who oppose this policy, to join with virtually all of our democratic neighbors to the south and all of our allies in Europe, to join with the Latin American Parliament, which issued a report just 10 days ago on April 5, condemning United States policy of aiding the Contras; to join with the three former Presidents, with the more than a dozen former Cabinet officials and many other leaders from the United States and Latin America who signed the report of the Inter-American Dialog condemning this policy, which I had delivered to the offices of all of my colleagues yesterday. I urge you to read that statement if you have not had an opportunity to do so yet. It was signed by leaders from all over the hemisphere, including former Cabinet members of the United States, former American Ambassadors, former American military officials; an outstanding group of business leaders and political leaders from our Nation and nations all over the hemisphere cochaired by the former President of Peru, and the former distinguished American Ambassador to the Organization of American States, Ambassador Lenowitz; a superb statement which I provided to all Members yesterday, condemning the proposal to aid the Contras.

I urge Members very strongly to vote "no" on war, to vote "yes" on the positive alternative that many of us will be offering later under the leadership of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Intelligence.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, one of the things the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] said struck me in an unusual way.

In all Communist countries with which I am familiar, there is severe repression, and Nicaragua is no exception. Yet the gentleman indicated in his remarks that the main responsibilities for the repression in this country, in Nicaragua, rests with the Contras and their aggressive attitude. Is that the impression you meant to leave?

Mr. BARNES. No, it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BARNES. What the existence of the Contras does, we are told; and the gentleman has had meetings with Contadora leaders so I am sure he has had the same message from them. What the existence of the Contras does is provide a beautiful excuse for the Sandinistas to take the actions that they have taken.

It makes it, their neighbors tell us, virtually impossible for them to put the kind of pressures that the Latin Americans are prepared, they tell us, to put on Nicaragua because of the policies that we are engaged in and the excuse that the Nicaraguans have in the negotiations that they have been engaged in.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the presentation of my colleague, Mr. BARNES reminds me of the reality that men and women are elected to Congress to make the tough choices. Not the simple—not the easy, but rather the complex and difficult choices.

And the most important decisions come at a time when your individual vote really counts—when what you decide to do with your vote may change the course of history for America.

Today, each of us is faced with just such a decision. The vote is going to be close. Four or five—maybe even one or two votes will make the difference.

As we come to decision time on Nicaragua—to support the freedom fighters or to allow the consolidation of a Communist state in our hemisphere, let us review a chapter of recent history:

During the session beginning in 1979, as new Members of Congress, my colleague Mr. BARNES and I listened with fascination while more learned and senior Members debated the role we should play as America joined forces to pressure Somoza to leave Nicaragua in the hands of a group who called themselves Sandinistas. Their rhetoric gave promise of a free and pluralistic society—that would hold democratic elections—would support a free press, freedom of religion, and bring an end to politicial oppression.

One side of the debate argued that we should give economic assistance to the new government because of the hope of the Sandinista promise. The other suggested that we should not be fooled by false promise and that the threat of Communist takeover was real.

Well, there was credibility to the argument of both sides and the Congress decided to go with hope. Those who say we walked away from the new government are wrong. During the next 18 months President Carter's administration and Congress poured $118 million in the Sandinista regime.

In the meantime the Ortega brothers and those who make up today's commandantes stole the revolution from the Nicaragua democrats. Businesses were closed, property confiscated, free speech and press obliterated, and the church humiliated. Voices of opposition were heard only from Nicaraguan jails and Miskito Indians were massacred. Finally in frustration, President Carter cut off aid and the democrats of Nicaragua began their effort to recapture the revolution of hope.

The history of the 1980's has been recounted here by others. Ortega has declared himself the leader of a revolution without borders. Sandinista efforts to destabilize the democratic states of Central America are well documented. We have made continued efforts through persuasion to bring about meaningful negotiations. Even our Speaker has recognized Ortega to be an "incompetent Marxist-Leninist Communist."

So that history brings us to the point of decision: Will we support the hope of the democrats in Nicaragua or will we let Ortega and the commandantes consolidate their Communist state?

The question is not $100 million when placed beside the $1.5 billion we already plan to spend in Latin America this year. So don't try to hide behind a sop to a balanced budget.

During hours of debate I have not heard one of my colleagues come to the floor to praise those Communists who call themselves Sandinistas. I did hear some argue: "If the Ortega brothers and the commandantes really mean to threaten El Salvador or Costa Rica—surely $100 million is not enough—then and only then we should send the Marines."

Well friends, I certainly hope this House has more to offer than two simplistic alternatives: On the one hand to send no money at all while we wish the Nicaraguan Communists to the table for negotiations, or, some suggest that after overt action against, and destabilization of, democracy in neighboring countries such as Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Honduras by the Sandinistas then send in the Marines!

Ortega has rejected Contadora and the Duarte initiative—our aid to the freedom fighters is our only hope to pressure them to the bargaining table.

I urge you today to cast your vote to continue the revolution begun by the freedom fighters against Somoza. Let your vote give freedom a chance to survive in the Americas.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] knows, I have a great deal of respect for him; but I really believe he sometimes gets himself into the utopia position. I wish there were ways to work that the gentleman from Maryland mentions, but they are not going to work.

I rise in support of the Contra aid. Basically I support the Senate compromise and oppose the first three amendments that will be offered today.

Four Members of the House went to Nicaragua, Mr. Chairman, several weeks ago: KEN GRAY, SANDY LEVIN, BUDDY DARDEN, and myself. We had voted 2 and 2 for and against Contra aid. I do not think we changed any votes on our trip.

However, and I think my colleagues will agree with this, we did find in place a Marxist-Leninist type of government in Nicaragua. There is no freedom of the press in that country; there is no religious freedom, and no free elections are being planned.

Mr. Chairman, if the freedom fighters are willing to risk their lives for freedom, I certainly want to help them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair will advise that the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] has 27 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER] has 16 minutes remaining, and consequently the Chair now recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to refute just a couple of points that were made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs.

First of all, he referred to the Contras as the Somoza guard; 98 percent of the Contras are campacinos and citizens of Nicaragua, and not the Somoza national guard. There are about 20 percent in the leadership, but the Contras are not the Somoza national guard.

He said aid will get us into war. I believe and I believe my colleagues on this side of the aisle believe that no aid will allow the Sandinistas to crush their opposition and consolidate their power and export revolution and then we will be forced into a war that is unnecessary and one we don't want.

Finally, Mr. Borge himself has said they want a revolution throughout all of Central America, up into Mexico. We must take them at their word.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of talk, especially earlier in the debate, about drugs. I would point out for my colleagues that the legislation we are debating, the Senate-passed resolution, provides that: No assistance under this joint resolution may be provided to any group that retains in its ranks any individual who has been found to engage in drug smuggling.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, no Member of this House has made any attempt whatsoever to deny the Qadhafi-Ortega connection. It is very clear and evident here that there is a tremendous alliance between both Mu'ammar Qadhafi and Daniel Ortega.

It is also obvious that we have made an attempt to bring about negotiations with Libyans. That is one of the reasons that we were led to this very last resort. There is almost unanimity of thought in both Houses of Congress that the President was correct in taking the action that he did in the strike against Libya. That is why it is very important for us to provide this much needed assistance to the freedom fighters.

A number of us have been greatly criticized by picketers at our offices. My district office has twice been picketed by a number of people; up to 50 just the day before yesterday, and I have to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is very important for us to realize as I have found when I visited Nicaragua, that the kind of gathering which took place outside of my office could not have taken place in Managua, because Ortega and the Sandinista regime, the Communist dictatorship, prevents that kind of gathering.

Mr. Chairman, not only do I welcome that kind of gathering outside my office, even though it disrupts the work of my office and the small businesses around my office, but I will take, and when we go into the full House, I will print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the announcement that they had calling people to that rally. That shows very clearly the difference between Nicaragua and the United States of America.

As I have reported to this House several times, based on the trip that we had, we are seeing two revolutions taking place in Nicaragua. One is a revolution without borders, as has been pointed out on several occasions. That revolution without borders was seen very clearly with the incursion into Honduras.

The second revolution, that important one of 1979, which the people of Nicaragua support. The revolution which called for free and fair elections, nonalignment, an end to human rights violations, that is what the people of Nicaragua want and that is all we are trying to provide them, is what they originally wanted in their quest in 1979 by overthrowing that horrible repressive Somoza dictatorship.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this package as these people of Nicaragua are reaching out for the same kinds of freedoms that we in the United States of America enjoy.

Stop U.S. support and sanction of repressive and fascist regimes like South Africa, El Salvador and Guatemala. Stop the use of your tax dollars to aid terrorists attempting to overthrow the legitimate governments of Nicaragua and Angola and to support U.S. international terrorism and geopolitical bullying. Demand that our government use its resources to promote peace and justice at home and abroad. Demand that our government respond to our cry. The time is now, the opportunity is here, and the rest is up to us!

Kickoff: Thursday, April 3, 6:30 pm; Avery auditorium, Pitzer College. A talk by Jeff Cohen on the role of the FBI in the harassment of Civil Rights Workers and the assassinations of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Black Panther leader Fred Hampton.

Sponsored by: Clarement Colleges' Central American Concern, Students Against Apartheid, and Black Students Union.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to the debate not only today but last month when we considered this matter, and read the account in the newspapers, I have asked myself this question time and again: Why is it so many of the Democrats in the House, who are dedicated and loyal Americans as any Republican in this House, see the issue in Nicaragua so differently than so many Republicans? It is one of the major differences between the two great political parties in America. Why is that? The answer really involves an interpretation of history that I think the American people should understand in terms of where the stewardship of power should be vested in the years to come.

Up until about 1975 in this country we had a bipartisan foreign policy that recognized the necessity of interfacing with Soviet expansionism wherever it occurred in the world. That bipartisan policy broke down in 1975, and since then the leadership of the Democratic Party in America has turned inward and isolationist and to justify their bias, their analysis goes something like this: We Americans are a revolutionary people. We won our Revolution 200 years ago from Great Britain and the tide of history is on the side of the revolutionary movement. What is going on in Central America is a revolution. We Americans should be on the side of revolution, not against it. Therefore, we should be supporting the forces of Ortega and those seeking a better life for those in Nicaragua.

It sounds pretty good. But let us look at it. The American Revolution was based on certain premises: Respect for private property, another respect for pluralism, respect for religious views, and respect for freedom of speech. The revolution going on in Central America claims to reflect all those values. They claim to pursue them, to respect them, but the fact is they do not support them.

That is why today 40 percent of the Contras are former Sandinistas. The revolution going on in Central America is one that is pursued with a gun, and the gun says to those with property: "If you do not give it up voluntarily, we will take it from you or your life, and we the government will redistribute this wealth to those who have a greater need than those who have it."

That violation of private property is the major distinction in the revolutions going on in Central America and the American Revolution and is responsible for the failure of this rostrum, now receding, which is the same failure of my Democratic colleagues who cannot understand the difference between the two revolutions in our world.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, as many of you know, I come from an agricultural area which is having serious, serious difficulties at this time. I must tell you that I have great difficulty understanding that if we need something to help our own people, it is constant cutback, cutback, cutback, we cannot do it. But if what we are going to do is to try to furnish arms to overthrow a government, then "don't worry about the cost, go right ahead." I do not agree with that. I think we should have some concern for the problems that exist herein. And if my friends who are so concerned about the budget, surely they should be somewhat concerned about the money we are spending in other areas as well.

Mr. WALKER, you are one of those that says we ought to worry about spending. Apparently 100 million bucks to the Contras does not bother you. We go ahead and throw it away.

What is your view?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have a question: Is the gentleman going to support my amendment to cut out the Irish aid?

Mr. BEDELL. I do not know about the gentleman's amendment to cut out the Irish aid. I do not know what it is about, what it says.

Mr. WALKER. That will be an amendment. Will the gentleman support that amendment to cut out the Irish aid?

Mr. BEDELL. That has nothing to do with this issue. This is whether you believe we ought to——

Mr. WALKER. Sure it does, sure it does. It is money going elsewhere. Is the gentleman willing to support stopping the money going to Ireland?

Mr. BEDELL. I am telling the gentleman I do not know what that amendment is, and I am not going to tell you what I am going to do if I do not know what the amendment is. What a ridiculous question for you to ask. You apparently do not think it matters a darn bit how much money we spend in furnishing arms to other countries to overthrow governments. That is the issue. The issue is not Ireland today. That is the issue. The gentleman is saying we have got to worry about our budget, but apparently you do not worry about it when it comes to this sort of thing. That bothers me.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. No, I will not. I am not going to spend all of my time talking about Irish aid. This is not Irish aid. This is whether we are going to send arms to try to overthrow a government. Some of us question whether that is advisable. But I have a greater concern than that, and that is that I do not have any love for the Sandinista government either. I think they have done a lot of bad things. We have seen what terrorism has done recently. We are against terrorism. But we are supporting terrorism when we support the Contras.

I have been down there. Let me tell you they are committing acts of terrorism against the people in Nicaragua.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a very quick question?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I apologize that I did not yield before.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. There was somebody else here before.

Will the gentleman acknowledge the intimate link between Qadhafi's Libya and the Sandinistas' Nicaragua? Does he understand that intimately? Does he understand how the two work inexorably together, that they have cooperated in terrorist training, that the Sandinistas are exporting terrorism?

Mr. BEDELL. That indeed is the issue, and I have told you I do not admire the Sandinista government. We agree on a lot of things, but let me finish if you may, it is my floor, if I may. It seems to me then we should objectively look at what it is we do in order to try to reduce the power and influence of that regime.

My contention is, for God's sake, if we want to strengthen a regime, all you have got to do is threaten it from without. That is what we are doing. That is what we are supporting in spite of the expenditures we are spending, that is what we are doing.

The issue is not whether we love the Sandinistas. I made that clear that I do not. The issue is not whether we feel they should have the associations that they have. I agree they should not.

The question is, Are we first of all going to overthrow them with $100 million of aid to the Contras. Does this gentleman think that will overthrow their government?

Mr. RITTER. Do I believe that the $100 million will be successful in overthrowing the government?

Mr. BEDELL. Yes.

Mr. RITTER. Well, I for one think that we can certainly neutralize MI-24 Hind-D helicopters with a few million dollars worth of Stingers. I do believe that.

Mr. BEDELL. That is not my question. Does the gentleman——

Mr. RITTER. I believe that we have, that there is a potential shot at it. It is a lot better shot than what—people in the gentleman's own party have stated that in the event the Soviets and Cubans establish a major base then U.S. troops would have to be sent into action. The gentleman from the other body stated that.

What we are trying to do is avoid that.

Mr. BEDELL. I understand, we are all trying to avoid it. I asked the gentleman a question and apparently the answer is yes. Certainly the gentleman does think that $100 million——

Mr. RITTER. We have freedom in Nicaragua——

Mr. BEDELL. No, please, it is my time, I wish the gentleman would not interrupt me. Apparently the gentleman does feel that $100 million aid to the Contras is likely to cause the overthrow of the Sandinista government. Is that correct?

Mr. RITTER. The possibility is distinct that the Sandinistas are so rotten——

Mr. BEDELL. I am sorry, it is my time, I asked the gentleman a question. It is either yes or no. Does he think the $100 million will overthrow the government?

Mr. RITTER. I think it would help, yes.

Mr. BEDELL. Does he think it is likely to overthrow the government of Nicaragua?

Mr. RITTER. I have no crystal ball as the gentleman.

Mr. BEDELL. Well, does he think——

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. No; I will not. You have taken up all my time so far talking about Ireland and everything else. The fact is that we have a problem in Nicaragua.

The fact is that the President is becoming more and more committed to the overthrow of that government. The fact is most people would tell you this is not going to do it, and most people would tell you the Contras are probably not going to do it.

I hope we will ask ourselves if we are committed to the overthrow of that government and the Contras cannot do it, how are we going to do it? And do you want to commit our young people to go to war in Central America.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. No; I am not going to yield. You have taken up all my time. I have about 1 minute left. I understand that, but some of us have a right to ask questions and those questions are: What happens when we have to send our own people down there, and if we do not, how the devil are you going to overthrow that government if the Contras cannot do it?

Thank you.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. I appreciate the feelings of the gentleman from Iowa. I empathize with those feelings. He wants peace in the region, but he should know that members of his own party have stated that, if the situation deteriorated, if the Soviets were indeed establishing a military base, then they would recommend the use of American troops. A member of the gentleman's party in the other body stated that and then, according to an ex-Vice President of the gentleman's party, a former Presidential candidate, quarantine, a blockade, might be necessary. That is precisely what we are trying to avoid by supporting forces indigenous to the region.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, we've come a long way in the last few months. It used to be that some of us had to stand up on this floor to try to convince some of our colleagues that the Sandinistas are dedicated Marxists committed to repressing their own people in the name of their "people's revolution." It used to be that we had to spell out for those who refused to listen to the details of how civil liberties have been suspended, freedoms have been trampled upon, and a nation has been imprisoned by its own government.

But now, that's all changed, for we all know the Sandinistas have systematically destroyed free expression in Nicaragua. We know that they've taken over all the radio and television stations and that they've heavily censored the press. We know that they've suppressed and humiliated the Catholic Church by harassing its leaders and shutting down its newspaper and radio station. We all know that they've betrayed their revolution and have lost whatever legitimacy they may have had as a representative democracy by denying all freedom of expression to their opposition; by invoking martial law and imprisoning, torturing and even executing their foes, and by supporting and subsidizing terrorist training bases and exporting terror and revolution to their neighbors.

The question before us now is simply, what are we going to do about it? The President has made his request for funding for the freedom fighters 2 months ago, and the other body has agreed with him. We have fooled around long enough and now we come once again to the moment of decision. We must decide whether we're going to continue to turn the other cheek to their transgressions, or whether we're going to pressure them to live up to the promises of freedom they made to the world 7 years ago.

Opponents of the legislation before us today have done their level best to avoid this issue and to keep the House from voting up or down on the President's aid package. The leadership has attached this aid package to a supplemental appropriations bill containing additional spending provisions that the President may veto, even though this aid package has nothing whatsoever to do with new appropriations, and is merely a reprogramming of Defense Department funds. They feel that by obscuring the procedure, they can evade a true vote on the issue, and divert the President from what most of us know must ultimately be done.

Mr. Chairman, this legislative maneuvering must not be allowed to succeed, for the Nicaraguan freedom fighters need our help.

There will be amendments here today that will attempt to impose restrictions and conditions on the President's proposal. One of my colleagues will offer an amendment to only allow assistance to refugees and support for the Contadoran process. He obviously lingers under the misguided notion that the Sandinistas intend to negotiate in good faith. I find that somewhat incredible in light of their recent refusal to even discuss a rational agreement at the bargaining table in Panama, but of course, the gentleman is entitled to his opinion. But so am I, and I am wholly convinced that the Sandinistas will never have any motivation to negotiate seriously, so long as we blindly leave them to their own sinister divices.

Another of my colleagues will propose an amendment to restrict the immediate release of defensive weapons, and if passed, his amendment would delay the release of the rest of the money until the administration has undertaken "serious" negotiations with the Sandinistas, whereupon there would, of course, have to be another vote on the issue. How many delays must be endured by a people who seek only to restore liberty to their own homes and those of their neighbors? The administration has already tried negotiations, and they have not worked. How many times must they be compelled by the legions of congressional "experts" in this body to return to a fruitless negotiating table? When will we realize that the Sandinistas will not negotiate away the death grip that they hold on their people without being pressured? When the Contras have been eradicated?

Mr. Chairman, the time has come to take firm action. The cruelest policy that we can impose on the Nicaraguan people is one of half-hearted restrictions on aid that is truly needed. We must show the freedom fighters that we intend to help them; we must show them that it is not dangerous to have a friend in the United States; we must convince them that we'll not leave them on the landing beaches of another "Bay of Pigs."

The time has come to cease our bleating and our helpless equivocating.

The time has come to let Central America know that it is every bit as important to us as is the Middle East.

The time has come to help the Nicaraguan freedom fighters, so I urge my colleagues to defeat these amendments and pass the President's aid package, unencumbered.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, we reserve the balance of our time.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I favor a period for unconditioned negotiations. Negotiations may not work, but the alternatives are worse.

If we pass military aid but fence it, it more likely than not will be counterproductive. Passage of military aid will likely cause the Sandinistas to stiffen their position still further. And it might also take pressure off the Reagan administration to negotiate vigorously, it preferring instead to wait out an interim period.

In fact, there now exists good cause for both sides to negotiate. A rough parity of peril prevails today. For the Sandinistas, there is the peril of the unknown, further U.S. military action. For the United States, there is the peril of different unknowns, that $100 million most likely will become just another step on an endless journey.

There are no easy answers here. There is every reason for reasoned debate, not reckless charges.

In that regard, the President was wrong in the New York Times interview of several weeks ago, when he said there was a basic difference of objectives here. No side in this debate likes the increasingly closed society being crafted by the Sandinistas. The problem is that each position contains the potential of unsatisfactory consequences. The United States, with our military capability and surveillance capabilities, can move to contain Nicaragua, to inhibit dramatically Nicaragua's ability to infiltrate into other nations. We can continue to act economically to boycott, to press for further sanctions.

Further, we can keep the glare of publicity on undemocratic practices and provide moral and financial support to opposition forces within Nicaragua.

The results of such a policy of containment and change are not totally certain. If we put our mind to it, containment should work. The outcome of pressures for internal change is less certain, and the result could be a Nicaragua cordoned off externally, but undemocratic inside.

But on the other hand, the logic of the Michel proposal can lead to massive involvement of U.S. troops to overthrow the Sandinistas.

The administration's policies toward Nicaragua have been plagued by unclear and shifting objectives. Its basic position is that the United States cannot live with the Sandinista regime. It was anxious to point out that United States helicopter pilots were not in danger when ferrying Honduras troops to the border several weeks ago, but the logic of its position means first United States military advisers, and then if need be hundreds of United States helicopter pilots, and then United States soldiers on the firing lines in the valleys and mountains of Nicaragua.

The sensitivity of the Reagan administration about such a result shows how unacceptable it is. The potential outcome of deepening U.S. military involvement militates in favor of giving negotiations a serious unfettered try now, no matter how difficult the process. The alternatives are indeed much worse. That is why I intend to support the Hamilton-Barnes proposal.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will this containment strategy the gentleman is talking about keep American marines like those who were shot down in a restaurant in El Salvador from being killed by Communist guerrillas trained in Managua?

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I think the answer to that is there is a good chance, yes, and a better chance than that of keeping United States marines out of Nicaragua fighting in the valleys and mountains under the administration's policy.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I have just signed up for two special orders, one tonight—I hope it is not a postmortem on a vote against freedom—and one for tomorrow night, because I cannot cover in 2 minutes the major human rights violations going on in our hemisphere at this moment.

Here is the report which I signed and put out together with my distinguished colleague from the majority side, the gentleman from Texas, CHARLES WILSON, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] and myself on the prison system in Nicaragua.

At the height of Somoza's cruelty to his own people, the deposed and murdered dictator, he had a high-water mark of 500 people in his prisons. There are now between 11,000 and 13,000 people in prison in Nicaragua.

I had the opportunity to debate a nun of my faith by radio in San Antonio. She told me that she has a friend who visits all of these political prisoners and that they are getting sensitivity training on their crimes against the people under Somoza.

The fact is the majority of these people fought against Somoza.

The map, which cannot be seen too well by Members in the back of the House, shows 10 major prisons and 4 suspected prisons. We do not yet have all the intelligence we need on Nicaragua—a country which is closer to my district in southern California than we are here in the Capital City.

But here is a graph that no one on the majority side who votes against the President has refuted. It says there were 20,000 square feet of prison footage under Somoza. It is now way over 100,000 square feet, locking up people who fought with the Communists who were part of the Sandinistas to free that country.

Look at these pictures. This is hard evidence.

I have offered several times in this well to resign from the Congress if somebody can show me this is a massive conspiracy between the leadership on both sides of the aisle, the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, and that somehow or other it is a coverup.

Without sufficient time to adequately cover this issue I urge, Mr. Chairman, my colleagues to please watch my special order, following that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] tonight, where I talk individually about each prison camp.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, this is the fourth time within a year that the House of Representatives is considering the issue of aid to the Nicaraguan Contras. A year ago last April the House decided that assistance to the Contras was wrong. Today, such aid still is wrong, and I urge the House to support the substitute to the Senate resolution offered by our colleague from Indiana, LEE HAMILTON, which does not provide any aid to the Contras.

There is no political, strategic, moral, or intellectual value in supporting the Contras. The administration's policy of seeking a military solution to our differences with Nicaragua is wrongheaded and it is doomed to failure. Yet, the administration persists in its efforts to promote the Contra cause. The administration is pressuring Honduras and Costa Rica to cooperate with our backing of the Contras. Recent news reports have now informed us that the CIA has given the Contras several million dollars during the past year for various Contra political projects.

Notwithstanding this enthusiastic support by the administration for the Contra cause, the hard truth is that the Contras do not have popular appeal in Nicaragua. Many of the Contras are viewed, correctly, as being former members of the hated Somoza national guard. The Contras have repeatedly engaged in terrorist campaigns against Nicaraguan civilians and their atrocities have been well documented by various human rights organizations. Even President Reagan, last June, belatedly acknowledged the acts of brutality committed by the Contras.

The Contras have no political legitimacy in Nicaragua. They are fighting a losing cause. There is no popular uprising on their behalf. They have not been able to hold a single town in Nicaragua, and, by themselves, they cannot dislodge the Saninistas.

The President has told us that our credibility will collapse and our alliances will crumble if we fail to aid the Contras and prevail in Central America. But, it is the President, and no one else, who has made our credibility and our alliances an issue. None of our major allies throughout the world support the President's promotion of the Contras. In particular, our friends and allies in Central America, who know this region best, do not back the President's policy. On the contrary, heads of state throughout Central and Latin America have called the Reagan administration's military support for the Contras wrong. The newly elected President of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias, has stated his desire to prevent the Contras from using Costa Rica as a base, and he has said that the President should use the $100 million that Mr. Reagan is seeking in military aid to the Contras for economic aid to United States-allied governments in that region. President Reagan, however, with the wrong kind of farsightedness, ignores the advice of our neighbors to the south.

The $100 million which the President asked for the Contras is nothing more than an additional downpayment to try to keep the Contra cause alive. I doubt that anyone in this Chamber seriously believes that this $100 million is going to help topple the Nicaraguan Government. The administration has failed to tell us what the upper limit is of financial aid to the Contras. It is inevitable that we will see additional requests in the future for escalating amounts of money to prop up the Contra forces.

Mr. Chairman, the President's policy toward Nicaragua is also very dangerous. It is dangerous because it permits the Reagan administration to inexorably push the United States deeper and deeper into a Central American quagmire. For those of us who remember the steps which led to our involvement in Vietnam, the parallel with Nicaragua is striking, and the lessons of our tragic experience in Vietnam must not be ignored. If this request for $100 million is approved, the President will interpret such support as a blanket congressional endorsement for whatever he seeks to do against Nicaragua. This, I fear, will eventually result in the involvement of our Nation in a military action against Nicaragua once it becomes obvious to the administration that the armed aggression by the externally financed Contras cannot succeed. At that point, this war by proxy against Nicaragua will cease being a war by proxy.

There, however, is an alternative to the administration's policy of unleashing the dogs of war in Central America. It is a process for a negotiated peace in Central America which has been proposed by the Contadora group of eight Latin American states. This Contadora peace process offers the best prospect for obtaining a long-term commitment to peace and stability in Central America and we should become a willing partner in the diplomatic pursuit for peace.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a brief observation about our policy toward Nicaragua and some recommendations.

In a representative democracy it is imperative that foreign policy in particular receive broad support if it is to work. This is especially important when it involves a long-term commitment, such as in the case of Nicaragua.

That the American people are split on increasing aid to the Contras is clear. Most polls, in fact, show that the majority of American people oppose increasing aid to the Contras.

While the American people may not agree on a policy toward Nicaragua, Mr. Chairman, they are united on policy goals. The American people, by and large, would like to see Nicaragua decrease reliance on the Soviet Union and Cuba; they want Nicaragua to reduce the size of its armed forces so that it no longer would in any way threaten its Latin neighbors; and, Mr. Chairman, they want Nicaragua to move toward a representative government that respects the rights of its citizens.

How do we accomplish our shared goals, Mr. Chairman? Well, I do not believe there is any policy guaranteed to work. I am convinced that continuing the current policy or escalating U.S. military support for the Contras will not do the job. The administration's policies toward Nicaragua have only worsen the situation. Compared to 1980, Nicaragua today is far more reliant on the Soviet Union and Cuba, its military force is double in size and the Sandinista government imposes far more restrictions on the rights of its citizens.

Nor do I believe that continuing to throw scraps to the Contras in the form of so-called humanitarian aid will work. We have gone this route before, Mr. Chairman. To go down it again will not bring us any closer to a consensus policy and will only prolong the agony down there.

I would argue, Mr. Chairman, that we settle the issue today. End U.S. support for the Contras and force the administration to go back to the drawing board and come up with a policy to accomplish our shared goals that can be supported by the American people.

One positive consequence of ending support for the Contras today would be that Mr. Ortega would no longer have that excuse for continuing to refuse to sign the Contadora regional compact. As we know, the Contadora treaty would send Cuban and Soviet military advisers home and require a reduction in Nicaragua's armed forces. I would urge the administration to take other more direct steps to resolve the situation, refraining from new military operations with Honduras designed to intimidate Nicaragua, and engaging the Sandinistas in direct negotiations. The administration should offer the possibility of normalizing trade relations with the United States and the possibility of economic assistance, in exchange for opening up the political process to all Nicaraguans, including the Contras. It should be made absolutely clear, too, that the United States will not tolerate domination by any foreign power, particularly the Soviet Union and Cuba, in our hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the Hamilton substitute and opt for a change in policy that has a much better chance to succeed than the one we are now following.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong opposition to this latest proposal, adopted by the other body, to provide $70 million in military assistance to the Contras and an additional $30 million in humanitarian assistance.

We are not dealing here with a one time vote to provide $100 million in aid to the Contras. We are considering the next step in the administration's program to overthrow the Sandinistas. We have been assured by the administration that it has no intention of becoming directly involved in the activities of the Contras, that the United States will not be called upon to commit its armed forces to the Contras' goals. Yet, despite these firm declarations of the President's intentions, they really are not a guarantee that we will not have to commit troops to the Contras' war against the Sandinistas.

One thing is clear. Without the monetary and logistical support of the United States the Contras would barely exist. Where is their support in Nicaragua? Why do they have no base in Nicaragua?

Mr. Chairman, this latest administration proposal for Contra aid will immediately provide defense arms for the Contras. I am tempted to ask what defensive arms means in this context. What territory do the Contras have to defend? They are based in Honduras, not Nicaragua. They have no territory to defend. Any arms they have are inevitably offensive, for they will be used to attack Nicaragua.

I will support the substitute offered by my colleague, Representative LEE HAMILTON, which will provide $27 million in humanitarian assistance for refugees from the Nicaraguan conflict, but which provides no assistance for the Contras.

Should that proposal fail, I will support the amendment offered by Mr. MCCURDY which restricts the use of funds provided in the measure adopted by the other body. I support this amendment because it allows the negotiation process undertaken by the Contadora nations to continue and postpones any military aid for 90 days. It requires that Congress act affirmatively in July in order to release any funds for military assistance. The Congress, under the McCurdy amendment, will retain control of the purse strings.

I will also support the amendment offered by my good friend Representatives MRAZEK. This amendment prohibits United States troops or employees from providing military training or assistance to the Contras in Honduras, Costa Rica, or El Salvador. This is the best guarantee that we have, under the circumstances, that U.S. troops will not be involved in the Contras' war.

Mr. Chairman, I do not support assistance for the Contras. I have said before that we are headed down the wrong road in Central America. If we vote to provide assistance today we will have moved further down the road of United States involvement in Nicaragua; we will have moved further away from a negotiated settlement and from peace. And we will not have succeeded in our acknowledged goals, to deny the Soviet Union an offensive military base in Central America and to promote peace in the region. I urge my colleagues to vote against House Joint Resolution 601, the Nicaraguan assistance provision.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, once again we are being asked to consider aid to the Contras. It is imperative that we ask ourselves why some would support such aid and precisely what might be gained or lost through any support given.

The stated objectives of Contra aid has varied from making democratic reforms in Nicaragua to the ousting of the Nicaraguan Government. It is clear that external pressures will not lead to democratic reforms in Nicaragua. In fact, the opposite is true. No country in history has ever become more democratic when it was dealing with an external threat. One has but to look at our own country's behavior during World War II to understand that individual rights may be violated in response to a threat. The removal of Japanese Americans from the west coast is interestingly similar to the removal of Nicaraguan Indians from the Rio Coco area. Neither act can be viewed as a high point for democracy and the protection of human rights.

The objective of removing the current Nicaraguan Government is not likely to be met by continuing aid to the Contras. The Contras have failed to get support within Nicaragua and it is clear that a far more massive military adventure would be necessary if the goal was to remove the government. There is no support for such a venture in the United States and our Latin American neighbors have expressed their opposition to such an approach.

If we are incapable of encouraging democratic reforms in Nicaragua or removing the current government through the use of the Contras, we must then take a look at whether any reasonable policy objective can be met by supporting the Contras. I fail to see any stated objective being met by financial support to the Contras.

If we are unable to gain the objectives that we articulate, we must go the next step and recognize just what it is that we have gained and lost through support for the Contras to date, and what is the likely result of further support. To date, we have been assigned the responsibility for the most objectionable behavior of the Contras; for example, terrorist attacks on Nicaraguan civilians, at the same time that we have virtually no control over these actions which would not be tolerated by any responsible American military commander. This behavior has led to a general sense of disgust on the part of our American neighbors who have repeatedly stated their support for the Contadora process and their understanding that that process of demilitarization cannot proceed without an understanding that Nicaragua cannot continue to be attacked.

Although there has long been a sense of hemispheric good will which has allowed our American neighbors to live with U.S. foreign policy actions of which they did not approve, we seem bound and determined to undermine those sentiments by assuming a right to interfere whenever and wherever it seemed to meet our immediate needs. Such policies are shortsighted and ignore the realities of modern transportation and communication which make it possible for our neighbors to the south to unite on issues of national integrity. Latin Americans see the U.S. intervention of Contra support as a threat to their own national integrity even though they may not be under such pressures at the moment. Unity in Latin America in friendship with the United States is in our interests. Unity in Latin America in defense against the United States is clearly not in our best interests. Nothing binds people together more than a common enemy. I, for one, do not want to see the United States perceived as being the common enemy of the peoples of Latin America.

Support for the Contras has also gained us one more expenditure in a time when we are told that we must cut Government spending. Although I would not argue against spending which increased the security of the United States and which was clearly in our best interests, I do not have any reason to believe that anything is to be gained by spending money to support the Contras. Although I would have questions if every penny were accounted for and were spent to supply the Contra forces, it is quite clear that a great deal of money is unaccounted for. The Contra leadership salaries always manage to get paid, but money allocated for those in the field seems to go astray leaving the rank and file without food, medical supplies and clothing. The last thing that this country can afford is to fatten the bank accounts of military leaders, be they in power or trying to get power.

Support for so-called humanitarian aid to the Contras has also caused problems. Humanitarian aid, by definition, must go to assist all parties to a conflict through neutral aid givers. The whole point of organizations such as the International Red Cross is to supply aid to all victims. Selective aid is simply a way to assist one side in a conflict and labeling it as "humanitarian" merely clouds the issue of genuine humanitarian aid to recognized nonaligned neutral organizations.

Latin Americans are working together to solve their own regional problems. It is not necessary that we stand by to shape their solutions. It is necessary that we not get in the way and that we not force any country to militarize in order to defend themselves from a direct attack by the United States or from attacks supported and supplied by the United States. In order for the Contadora process to proceed we do not have to come up with any solutions to anyone's problems. We can simply stop sending, or implying that we will send, money to the Contras. That does not seem to be a very difficult task.

It is my hope that all of my colleagues will see fit to vote against Contra aid. This is the only choice open to us which is consistent with our interests and consistent with the will of the vast majority of our people.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, during yesterday's debate on the rule, Mr. BONIOR quoted a New York Times poll concerning public views of aid to the Contras.

Mr. BONIOR correctly quoted the New York Times poll as showing that a majority of Americans polled are opposed to the President's position.

Today I would like to tell you the rest of the story of that poll, a story neither the gentleman from Michigan nor any of the President's critics have discussed.

First, while the poll shows that there is opposition to the President's position, it also shows the following:

Only 38 percent of those polled know that the administration is supporting the Contras and not the Government in Nicaragua.

As to the nature of the Sandinista regime, just 20 percent think it is Communist, 19 percent think it is a rightwing dictatorship and 49 percent haven't the slightest idea what ideology the Sandinistas have.

Fifty-nine percent believe the Nicaraguan Government would provide the Soviet Union with military bases and 56 percent agree that Nicaragua constitutes a threat to the security of other Central American countries.

This is an astounding fact. After 6 years of debate and discussion and evening television news, only 38 percent of the American people know which side the administration is supporting.

And this lack of knowledge isn't a new phenomenon.

Consider two national polls taken by the New York Times/CBS News. One was taken in April 1984 and the other in May and June 1985. Both showed that less than a majority favor the President's programs in Central America. But in the story describing the results of the 1984 poll, the Times reported:

> Only 19% of those surveyed could answer that the United States supported the opponents of the Nicaraguan government. Although the figure is an increase of 6 percentage points since last June (i.e. June, 1983), 62% of those who were interviewed said they had not been following events in the region carefully enough to identify which side the United States supported.

In the story accompanying the results of the 1985 poll, the Times said:

> Support for the Reagan administration policy is increasing, especially among the growing number who know which side the United States backs.

That "growing number" was 26 percent of those interviewed.

What are we to make of this scarcely credible confusion and lack of knowledge?

I say it is proof that American democracy, which depends upon an informed electorate, is being ill-served.

It is being ill-served by those of us in Congress who either can't or won't tell the facts to our constituents.

Maybe we just don't want to talk about Nicaragua because it is a tough question. Maybe we ourselves are not as informed as we should be.

But for whatever reason, those of us in Congress are not communicating the facts about Nicaragua to our people, except to activists on both sides.

Remember what I'm talking about—less than 40 percent of the people are certain what side we are supporting in Nicaragua. That doesn't even get into complicated questions of policy.

The administration also stands indicted for not communicating the facts. They have done a poor job.

And, yes, the national media must bear their part of the shame for this situation. Most Americans get their news from television. And if 6 years of television news has left the public so confused, maybe we're getting too much soap and not enough substance in our newscasts.

We all stand indicted for failure to inform the people. The New York Times poll shows that this debate is being held without the kind of informed electorate our democratic process demands.

The House, the Senate, the administration, and the media all have to do some soul-searching.

The point I am making is that as men and women responsibly elected to this body by the people, we ought not simply put our finger to the wind and test every vote we make here by public opinion polls. That is not the way strong men and women, elected to responsible positions, should act around here. From time to time we have got to sense, from all the information available to us, that we have got to accept responsibility and exercise it, we have got to lead. And, hopefully, the American people will follow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 6 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] has 7½ minutes remaining. The gentleman from New York, on a resolution that opened on the minority side, will have the right to close.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is 7½ minutes remaining on the other side of the aisle?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 6 minutes remaining on the general debate.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there is no person in the body that I admire more than the distinguished Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], but I found myself being very surprised by his remarks. In effect, he is suggesting that the American people do not understand this issue and it is for that reason that they are apparently opposed by majorities of 2 and 3 and 4 to 1, depending upon which group and which question is asked, to the President's proposal to provide military aid to the so-called Contras. I can understand his search for an explanation for this situation. Every group and region in the United States, whether you take it by income, background, education or political party, opposes this proposal. After years of discussion of this issue by the administration, it is obviously difficult and embarrassing to find the American people standing resolutely against providing military aid to the Contras.

The fact is that if we act today to support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], we will be acting against the repeated opinion of the people of this country.

Now, there are times, I suppose, when it could be argued that it is our job, our duty, to go public opinion, against the American preference, against the will of the people, in order to provide leadership. But let us understand, at least, that that is what we are doing.

If it is decided by this body to provide military aid to the Contras, we are acting against the opinion of our constituents, against the opinion of the people whom we were sent here to represent.

I do not concede that that is necessarily wrong. There are times when we must stand up and vote our convictions as to what we believe to be in the best interest of our country. But they should be acknowledged as such.

Beyond that, I think we ought to recognize the wisdom of the Secretary of Defense, Mr. Weinberger, who said that before we send American forces into an area to fight a war, we should have the firm, committed opinion, of the American people to back them up. It would be equally wise to extend that condition to proxy wars when they are being proposed, because this is nothing more or less than a declaration of a proxy war against Nicaragua in which American money and American weapons will be used and Nicaraguan lives lost. Before we embark on such an undertaking, perhaps it would be better that the American people be convinced that it is in our national interest, that they believe it is in the course of advancing freedom and liberty in that region and here.

So far, the record is clear, from every objective survey and every objective analysis done by the media and by people on both sides of this issue, that that is not the case.

If the American people could vote directly today on the Michel amendment, they would vote a resounding "no."

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, we have one last speaker to sum up for this side, so we will reserve our time at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] has 7½ minutes remaining.

Does the gentleman from New York desire all that time for summary?

Mr. SOLOMON. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman intended to make some time available to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SOLOMON. That is correct, Mr. Chairman. We are privileged to have the gentleman from Missouri sum up for this side.

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman from Missouri is going to be the final speaker in the debate?

Mr. SOLOMON. Yes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, in that case, I yield myself the remaining time on this side.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to address an issue that I am rather surprised was placed into this debate, it is the suggestion that if the Sandinista regime has had any connections with Libya, this ought to justify a decision for us, with proxy forces, to invade Nicaragua.

I just want to suggest, as did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] that, if that is the assumption, then the gentleman should be prepared to take action against Cuba, Syria, the Soviet Union, countries all over the world with which I do not presume he wants to go immediately to war through proxies or otherwise.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

By the way, I think the gentleman said something in debate that I wonder if he would like to confirm. I believe that I heard him say that those in the course of opposition to the President's proposal here were congressional fellow travelers. Did I hear the gentleman correctly?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. No, the gentleman did not hear that from me. He may have heard that from another Member of this body, but it was not from me.

My question is: The gentleman indicated that we would be involved in a proxy war, a United States proxy war.

Would the gentleman concede that the Soviets, who sent 18,000 tons of war materials in there last year, are involved in a proxy war on our continent?

Mr. FOLEY. On our continent?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Yes, in our continent, on the Continent of North America.

Mr. FOLEY. Not in the same way. There are no Soviet troops fighting in this area. As far as I know, the United States maintains diplomatic relations, for whatever purpose, with Nicaragua. One might question that, but I do not think there is any question that the President himself last year suggested that if we provided open support for the Contras we would be engaging in an act of war. That is the President's statement of what he felt would be the result of the proposal that is now before us. Under the circumstances, I think to call it a proxy war is certainly within the gambit of what the President has suggested.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I just want to understand the aspect of——

Mr. FOLEY. I have only about a minute to conclude, and I would like to take it to do so.

This is an issue on which Democrats and Republicans disagree. It is also an issue on which Democrats and Democrats disagree and Republicans and Republicans disagree. I want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] for saying that everybody in this well is a patriot who is concerned about the future of this country, about freedom in this continent and hemisphere, and about the prevention of Soviet bases or Soviet capacity to work against their neighbors.

The question is whether this particular policy is correct and wise. The position that is being taken against it is one which is supported by the American people.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, when it comes to foreign policy, we all agree that partisanship ends at the water's edge, and it is because of that that I yield the balance of our time to one of the most distinguished Members of this House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON], who has proved this time and time again. I am proud to yield our remaining time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the basic resolution, the resolution that was passed in the Senate just several days ago. I do this in the best of bipartisan spirit, because I realize that the future of our country, the national security to which all of us are so interested in, must be on a bipartisan basis.

Mr. Chairman, this is legislation before us that is basically what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER] and I worked out over a period of several days with the White House prior to the last vote, with one exception. Prior to the last vote, the President agreed—after a great deal of difficult negotiations with the White House—agreed to specifics which would allow 90 days for negotiations to give one last clear chance for negotiations to work; should that be impossible, to allow training to go on and to allow defensive weaponry, to bring about insistence upon human rights, to bring all people into the political process and the process of resistance in Nicaragua, including the Indians, including the southern front, to make sure that there is a cleaning up of the resistance movement. We have talked about all those things and the President did agree to give an Executive order to that effect.

As you know, that failed by a few votes. It failed because some people wanted the very same thing to be in legislation.

Mr. Chairman, we have that before us today, because that is exactly what the Senate passed, the legislative agreement that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER] and I worked out for an Executive order.

Now, let us look at this basically. We have two interests as Americans. No. 1 is that of national security. The second is that of supporting democracy.

Let us look at the first. There is a national security interest in having the Communists suppressed, to having a democratic regime in Nicaragua, because it is a potential proxy territory for communism, not just to be there, but to foment into the entire area possibly and threats to cut off the southern port areas, the Panama Canal, and all the national security interests that we have in the southern part of our country.

The second is that of supporting democracy and fighting and standing against communism. Democracy is alive in Central America. Costa Rica has been doing well. We know that. Honduras is new at it and we are proud of what they are doing. In El Salvador, we know all that story and it is a success story that this Congress can take pride in because we passed legislation that encouraged it and fomented democracy to go in there and stay there, and it is working.

Now Guatemala is falling into the same pattern. But there is a cancer in the center of all this and that is the Sandinista Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, let us look at some basic things that all of us agree upon. No. 1 is that we agree that the American Nation has important interests in Central America.

We also all agree that the United States should support democratic states in our region with economic and security assistance. Everyone opposes the Nicaraguan subversion. Everyone also opposes the establishment of a Soviet beachhead in Nicaragua. These are things that no one will really disagree with and no one argues anymore about the nature of the Sandinista regime, because we all agree it is brutal, repressive, a communistic dictatorship, and this is something that all of us understand so well.

Now, what we need to do, Mr. Chairman, is to forge a bipartisan consensus and that is what the Senate resolution does and that is what this basic document to which we are addressing ourselves today does. It creates a diplomatic and economic and military carrot and stick in dealing with the Sandinistas. It establishes a commission on Central American negotiations. It furthers the democractizing of the resistance, giving real power to such people in the democratic resistance, like Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo.

It broadens the resistance by including the Indians, the Misurasata Indians included, and the southern opposition bloc, also known as BOS.

What is very important to us is that it cleans up the resistance, because there have been charges made concerning the human rights violations and other violations that I think all of us will agree should be addressed. That is what this does.

There are other amendments and I urge the body, Mr. Chairman, not to vote for those other amendments.

I can see us basically on the same track, but what we should do is send a clear message in a clear-cut legislative piece, and that is what has come for the Senate, and that is what we wish to pass today without the encumbrance of those other amendments.

We wish to give the Contras a meaningful assistance within the next few months. We cannot do this if we prohibit them from receiving defensive weapons during that 90 days of negotiations.

We should not postpone the congressional decision again on this critical issue until late in the summer, because when you do that you send a message not just to the Sandinistas that we do not mean what we say, but we send a message to all of Central America that we do not stand by our friends and our allies by what we say for democracy.

Nicaragua's recent aggression against its neighbor Honduras and its torpedoing of the Contadora talks show why aid to the Contras and the pressure that it would bring on the Sandinistas is needed soon. It is needed now.

We must by the measure that I am urging not prolong the inevitable, because we do as a nation stand behind the basic tenets of democracy and freedom.

Mr. Chairman, we have our credibility as a nation at stake. We have national security as a nation at stake. This is a decision we must make for democracy and against communism. That is very clear and that issue is at stake.

If we have learned anything from the lessons of history, it is that prolonged indecision and lack of looking clearly where we are going does not determine a true course and policy.

Mr. Chairman, I urge sincerely the defeat of all amendments and the adoption of the basic language in House Joint Resolution 601. It will be a vote for democracy in our Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

Pursuant to House Resolution 415, the joint resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

No amendments are in order except the following amendments, which shall not be subject to amendment or to a demand for a division of the question and shall be considered only in the following order and each amendment listed below shall be debatable for 2 hours equally divided and controlled by the Member offering the amendment and a Member opposed thereto:

(1) An amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative HAMILTON;

(2) An amendment, which may be offered only if the amendment designated (1) above has been rejected, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative MCCURDY; and

(3) An amendment, which may be offered only if the amendment designated (1) above has been rejected, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative MRAZEK.

The text of House Joint Resolution 601 is as follows:

H.J. RES. 601

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PURPOSES

SECTION 1. The purposes of this joint resolution are to promote peace, stability, and democracy in Central America, to encourage a negotiated resolution of the conflict in the region and, toward these ends, to enable the President to provide additional assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, as requested by the President on February 25, 1986, pursuant to the provisions of section 722(p) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-83) and section 106(a) of the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 99-88), subject to the terms and conditions of this joint resolution.

POLICY TOWARD CENTRAL AMERICA

SEC. 2. (a) It is the policy of the United States that—

(1) the building of democracy, the restoration of peace, the improvement of living conditions, and the application of equal justice under law in Central America are important to the interests of the United States and the community of American States;

(2) the interrelated issues of social and human progress, economic growth, political reform, and regional security must be effectively dealt with to assure a democratic and economically and politically secure Central America; and

(3) the September 1983 Contadora Document of Objectives, which sets forth a framework for negotiating a peaceful settlement to the conflict and turmoil in the region, is to be encouraged and supported.

(b) The United States strongly supports as essential to the objectives set forth in subsection (a)—

(1) national reconciliation in Nicaragua and the creation of a framework for negotiating a peaceful, democratic settlement to the Nicaraguan conflict; and

(2) efforts to reach a comprehensive and verifiable final agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives, including efforts to encourage the Government of Nicaragua to pursue a dialogue with the representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition for the purposes of achieving a democratic political settlement of the conflict, including free and fair elections.

POLICY TOWARD THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

SEC. 3. (a) United States policy toward Nicaragua shall be based upon Nicaragua's responsiveness to continuing concerns affecting the national security of the United States and Nicaragua's neighbors about—

(1) Nicaragua's close military and security ties to Cuba and the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies, including the presence in Nicaragua of military and security personnel from those countries and allies;

(2) Nicaragua's buildup of military forces in numbers disproportionate to those of its neighbors and equipped with sophisticated weapons systems and facilities designed to accommodate even more advanced equipment;

(3) Nicaragua's unlawful support for armed subversion and terrorism directed against the democratically elected governments of other countries;

(4) Nicaragua's internal repression and lack of opportunity for the exercise of civil and political rights which would allow the people of Nicaragua to have a meaningful voice in determining the policies of their government through participation in regularly scheduled free and fair elections and the establishment of democratic institutions; and

(5) Nicaragua's refusal to negotiate in good faith for a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America based upon the comprehensive implementation of the September 1983 Contadora Document of Objectives and, in particular, its refusal to engage in a serious national dialogue with all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

(b) The United States will address the concerns described in subsection (a) through economic, political, and diplomatic measures, as well as through support for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. In order to assure every opportunity for a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America, the United States will—

(1) engage in bilateral discussions with the Government of Nicaragua with a view toward facilitating progress in achieving a peaceful resolution of the conflict, if the Government of Nicaragua simultaneously engages in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition; and

(2) limit the types and amounts of assistance provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance and take other positive action in response to steps taken by the Government of Nicaragua toward meeting the concerns described in subsection (a).

(c) The duration of bilateral discussions with the Government of Nicaragua and the implementation of additional measures under subsection (b) shall be determined, after consultation with the Congress, by reference to Nicaragua's actions in response to the concerns described in subsection (a). Particular regard will be paid to whether—

(1) freedom of speech, assembly, religion, and political activity are being respected in Nicaragua and progress is being made toward the holding of regularly scheduled free and fair elections;

(2) there has been a halt to the flow of arms and the introduction of foreign military personnel into Nicaragua, and a withdrawal of all foreign military personnel has begun;

(3) a cease-fire with the Nicaraguan democratic resistance is being respected; and

(4) Nicaragua is refraining from acts of aggression, including support for insurgency and terrorism in other countries.

(d) The actions by the United States under this joint resolution in response to the concerns described in subsection (a) are consistent with the right of the United States to defend itself and to assist its allies in accordance with international law and treaties in force. Such actions are directed, not to determine the form or composition of any government of Nicaragua, but to achieve a comprehensive and verifiable agreement among Central American countries, based upon the 1983 Contadora Document of Objectives, including internal reconciliation within Nicaragua, based upon democratic principles, without the use of force by the United States. Nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as authorizing any member or unit of the Armed Forces of the United States to engage in combat against the Government of Nicaragua.

POLICY TOWARD THE NICARAGUAN DEMOCRATIC RESISTANCE

SEC. 4. (a) It is the policy of the United States to assist all groups within the Nicaraguan democratic resistance which—

(1) are committed to work together for democratic national reconciliation in Nicaragua based on the document issued by the six Nicaraguan opposition parties on February 7, 1986, entitled "Proposal to the Nicaraguan Government for a Solution to the Crisis in Our Country"; and

(2) respect international standards of conduct and refrain from violations of human rights or from other criminal acts.

(b) No assistance under this joint resolution may be provided to any group that retains in its ranks any individual who has been found to engage in—

(1) gross violations of internationally recognized human rights (as defined in section 502B(d)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961); or

(2) drug smuggling or significant misuse of public or private funds.

(c)(1) The Congress finds that the Nicaraguan democratic resistance has been broadening its representative base, through the forging of cooperative relationships between the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO) and other democratic resistance elements, and has been increasing the responsiveness of military forces to civilian leadership.

(2) The President shall use the authority provided by this joint resolution to further the developments described in paragraph (1) and to encourage the Nicaraguan democratic resistance to take additional steps to strengthen its unity, pursue a defined and coordinated program for representative democracy in Nicaragua, and otherwise increase its appeal to the Nicaraguan people.

(d) In furtherance of the policy set out in this section, not less than $10,000,000 of the funds transferred under section 5(a) shall be available only for assistance to resistance forces otherwise eligible and not currently included within UNO, of which amount $5,000,000 shall be available only for the Southern Opposition Bloc (BOS) and $5,000,000 shall be available only for the Indian resistance force known as Misurasata.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, no member of the United States Armed Forces, or employee of any department, agency, or other component of the United States Government may enter Nicaragua to provide military advice, training, or logistical support to paramilitary groups operating inside that country.

TRANSFER OF FUNDS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) The Congress hereby approves the provision of assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance in accordance with the provisions of this joint resolution.

(2) There are transferred to the President for use in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution $100,000,000 of unobligated funds from such accounts for which appropriations were made by the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986 (as contained in Public Law 99-190), as the President shall designate. No limitation or restriction contained in section 10 of Public Law 91-672, section 8109 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986, section 502 of the National Security Act of 1947, or any other provision of law shall apply to the transfer or use of such funds.

(b) Notwithstanding the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, not more than 25 percent of the funds transferred under subsection (a) may be available for obligation or expenditure in accordance with this joint resolution upon the date of enactment of this joint resolution, and not more than an additional 15 percent of such funds may be so available upon the transmittal of each report required by section 12.

(c) Funds transferred under subsection (a) shall remain available for the same periods of time, but not to exceed September 30, 1987, as such funds would have been available under the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986 (as contained in Public Law 99-190), but for the enactment of this joint resolution.

(d)(1) There are transferred to the President out of funds appropriated by the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 99-88), under the heading "Assistance For Implementation of a Contadora Agreement" such sums as the President may require, but not more than $2,000,000, to facilitate the participation of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras in regional meetings and negotiations to promote peace, stability, and security in Central America. No limitation or restriction contained in section 15 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956, section 10 of Public Law 91-672, or any other provision of law shall apply to the transfer or use of such funds.

(2) Funds transferred under paragraph (1) shall remain available for the same period of time as such funds would have been available under the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 99-88), but for the enactment of this joint resolution.

FUNDS FOR HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE

SEC. 6. (a) Of the amounts transferred under section 5(a), $30,000,000 shall be available only for the provision of humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance by the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Assistance Office (established by Executive Order 12530).

(b) Of the $30,000,000 made available only for purposes of subsection (a), $3,000,000 shall be available only for strengthening programs and activities of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance for the observance and advancement of human rights.

APPLICATION OF EXISTING LAWS

SEC. 7. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this joint resolution, funds transferred under section 5(a) shall be available for the purposes described in section 105(a) of the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1986, and all the requirements, terms, and conditions of such section and sections 101 and 102 of such Act, section 502 of the National Security Act of 1947, and section 106 of the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 99-88), shall be deemed to have been met for such use of such funds.

(b) The use of funds made available under this joint resolution is subject to all applicable provisions of law and established procedures relating to the oversight by the Congress of operations of departments and agencies.

(c) Nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as permitting the President to furnish additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance from funds other than the funds transferred under section 5(a) or otherwise specifically authorized by the Congress for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

USE OF FUNDS AFTER A PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT

SEC. 8. If the President determines and so reports to the Congress that a peaceful settlement of the conflict in Central America has been reached, then the unobligated balance, if any, of funds transferred under section 5(a) shall be available for the purposes of relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction in Central American countries in accordance with the authorities contained in chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to economic support fund assistance).

INCENTIVES FOR A NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT

SEC. 9. (a) Assistance under this joint resolution shall be provided in a manner designed to encourage the Government of Nicaragua to respond favorably to the many opportunities available for achieving a negotiated settlement of the conflict in Central America. These opportunities include the following proposals:

(1) Six opposition Nicaraguan political parties on February 7, 1986, called for an immediate cease-fire, an effective general amnesty, abolition of the state of emergency, agreement on a new electoral process and general elections, effective fulfillment of international commitments for democratization, and observance of implementation of these actions and commitments by appropriate international groups and organizations;

(2) President Reagan on February 10, 1986, offered simultaneous talks between the Government of Nicaragua and all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition in Nicaragua and between the Government of Nicaragua and the United States Government;

(3) President Jose Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador on March 5, 1986, offered an additional dialogue between the Government of El Salvador and the insurgents in El Salvador if the Government of Nicaragua would simultaneously engage in a dialogue with all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition; and

(4) President Reagan's Message to the Congress of March 19, 1986, proposed a mission to Latin America by his special envoy to encourage the Contadora and Support Group countries to join in urging the Government of Nicaragua to initiate a national dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

(b) In furtherance of the objectives set forth in subsection (a), and except as provided in subsection (c), assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance under this joint resolution shall be limited to the following:

(1) humanitarian assistance (as defined in section 722(g)(5) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985);

(2) logistics advice and assistance;

(3) support for democratic political and diplomatic activities;

(4) training in radio communications, collection, and utilization of intelligence, logistics, and small-unit skills and tactics; and

(5) equipment and supplies necessary for defense against air attacks.

(c) On and after July 1, 1986, the restrictions in subsection (b) shall cease to apply beginning 15 days after the President determines and reports to the Congress that—

(1) the Central American countries have not concluded a comprehensive and effective agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives,

(2) the Government of Nicaragua is not engaged in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire and an effective end to the existing constraints on freedom of speech, assembly, religion, and political activity, leading to regularly scheduled free and fair elections and the establishment of democratic institutions, and

(3) there is no reasonable prospect of achieving such agreement, dialogue, cease-fire, and end to constraints described in paragraphs (1) and (2) through further diplomatic measures, multilateral or bilateral, without additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, unless the Congress has enacted a joint resolution under section 10 disapproving the provision of additional assistance (other than assistance described in subsection (b)).

(d)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (c), no assistance (other than the assistance described in paragraphs (1) through (4) of subsection (b)) shall be provided at any time to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance under this joint resolution if—

(A) the President determines that—

(i) the Central American countries have concluded a comprehensive and effective agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives; or

(ii) the Government of Nicaragua is engaging in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire and an effective end to the existing constraints on freedom of speech, assembly, religion, and political activity leading to regularly scheduled free and fair elections and the establishment of democratic institutions; or

(B) the Congress enacts a joint resolution under section 10 disapproving the provision of additional assistance (other than assistance described in paragraphs (1) through (4) of subsection (b)).

(2) The prohibition contained in paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to assistance described in paragraph (5) of subsection (b) if the Government of Nicaragua acquires additional equipment or materiel to carry out air attacks.

(e) The limitations on assistance that may be furnished to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance which are contained in subsections (b) and (d) shall cease to apply if the Congress enacts a joint resolution, in accordance with section 10, stating that the Government of Nicaragua has failed to accept or observe a cease-fire with the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

(f)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, on or after July 1, 1986, funds may be obligated or expended under this joint resolution only if the President determines and reports to the Congress that the Nicaraguan democratic resistance groups receiving assistance under this joint resolution have agreed to and are beginning to implement—

(A) confederation and reform measures to broaden their leadership base;

(B) the coordination of their efforts;

(C) the elimination of human rights abuses;

(D) the pursuit of a defined and coordinated program for achieving representative democracy in Nicaragua; and

(E) the subordination of military forces to civilian leadership.

(2) In making his determination under paragraph (1), the President shall take into account the effectiveness and legitimacy of the political leadership of those Nicaraguan democratic resistance groups receiving assistance under this joint resolution, including the ability of that political leadership—

(A) to reflect the views and objectives of the internal and external Nicaraguan democratic opposition;

(B) to function as the spokesman for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition with Central Americans, international organizations, and the United States Government;

(C) to represent the Nicaraguan democratic opposition in dealing with the Government of Nicaragua;

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. HAMILTON

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. HAMILTON: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

UNITED STATES POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

SECTION 1. (a) The primary objectives of United States policy in Central America should be—

(1) to preserve the security of the United States;

(2) to prevent the Soviet Union and its allies from seeking to destabilize the region or to develop or deploy an offensive military capability which directly threatens the United States;

(3) to achieve peace and reconciliation;

(4) to promote stability and economic development;

(5) to promote the observance of human rights and the strengthening of democratic processes; and

(6) to live at peace with Nicaragua so long as Nicaragua lives at peace with its neighbors.

(b) United States strategy for achieving the objectives stated in subsection (a) should include—

(1) an emphasis on seeking a negotiated, regional settlement;

(2) respect for the independence and territorial integrity of all nations;

(3) a clear commitment, through appropriate types and levels of military and economic assistance, to assist the nations of Central America in building and sustaining viable, democratic societies capable of withstanding aggression and subversion and of providing their people with an opportunity for better lives; and

(4) consistent diplomatic support on behalf of the observance of human rights by groups and governments, and support for democratic institutions throughout the region, in recognition of the fact that subversion feeds on repression.

(c) In furtherance of the objectives stated in subsection (a), United States policy with respect to Nicaragua should include the following:

(1) A commitment to preserve the security of the United States by preventing the Soviet Union and its allies from developing or deploying an offensive military capability in Central America that directly threatens the United States.

(2) A commitment to protect the security and territorial integrity of any nation of Central America from unlawful actions by Nicaragua, in conformance with the Charter of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, which provide for collective action.

(3) Pursuit of a regional settlement through all diplomatic avenues, including—

(A) effective support for the Contadora process, which is addressing the questions of peace and security (including mechanisms for verification and enforcement) and internal reconciliation and political pluralism;

(B) giving priority to obtaining a ceasefire in Nicaragua;

(C) renewing bilateral talks with Nicaragua; and

(D) encouraging direct talks among the parties to the conflict in Nicaragua.

(4) The provision of incentives to Nicaragua if, over the long term, the Government of Nicaragua improves its conduct, including by agreeing to a ceasefire and to negotiate with its opponents, removing foreign military advisors, agreeing not to provide material support for insurgencies and agreeing to appropriate monitoring procedures under Contadora auspices to verify such agreement, respecting human rights and the independence of the media, and making progress toward national reconciliation and a pluralistic democratic system. Incentives should be structured to enable the United States to respond to positive steps by Nicaragua. These incentives could include—

(A) the suspension of United States military exercises in the region;

(B) the resumption of normal trade, including the resumption of nondiscriminatory trade treatment (MFN status), the restoration of benefits under the Generalized System of Preferences, and the restoration of Nicaragua's sugar quota;

(C) supporting bilateral and multilateral assistance for Nicaragua and providing technical assistance, help in agriculture and health, and volunteer services; and

(D) the creation of a Central American Development Organization (in accordance with section 464 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961) in which Nicaragua could participate.

(5) The imposition of further sanctions against Nicaragua should it intensify or expand activities hostile to United States interests and to peace and security within Central America. Such sanctions could include obtaining the cooperation of our allies in Western Europe and Japan, now Nicaragua's largest trading partners, in—

(A) cutting trade with Nicaragua;

(B) stopping bilateral assistance and blocking multilateral assistance to Nicaragua;

(C) imposing comprehensive economic sanctions against Nicaragua;

(D) breaking diplomatic relations with Nicaragua; and

(E) working with our Latin America allies, especially those in Central America, to isolate Nicaragua in regional affairs.

Such sanctions can only be effective if taken together with our allies. Unilateral sanctions have not and will not be effective.

ASSISTANCE FOR HUMANITARIAN NEEDS

SEC. 2. (a) Of the funds authorized to be transferred by section 4, up to $27,000,000 may be used by the President to provide food, medicine, or other assistance for the humanitarian needs of those who have been displaced by conflict in Nicaragua, regardless of whether they have been associated with the Nicaraguan opposition forces.

(b) Assistance under this section may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and only upon that organization's determination that such assistance is necessary to meet humanitarian needs.

ASSISTANCE IN SUPPORT OF THE CONTADORA PROCESS

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress reaffirms its support for the Contadora initiatives and is prepared to support the regional peace process with financial assistance. Accordingly, the President may use up to $5,000,000—

(1) to provide assistance to the Contadora nations of Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia, and the Contadora Support Group nations of Argentina, Peru, Uruguay, and Brazil, to assist those nations in reaching agreement among the nations of Central America based on the Contadora Document of Objectives of September 9, 1983, including assistance for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems; and

(2) to help implement any joint border commission agreement between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, or between Nicaragua and Honduras, which those nations enter into in furtherance of the purposes of the Contadora Document of Objectives.

(b) In addition to funds transferred pursuant to section 4, the $2,000,000 appropriated under the heading "ASSISTANCE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF A CONTADORA AGREEMENT" by the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985, may be used to carry out this section.

TRANSFER OF DOD FUNDS

SEC. 4. The President may transfer up to $30,000,000 of the funds appropriated by the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986 (as contained in Public Law 99-190), for use in carrying out sections 2 and 3. The funds transferred under this section may include funds that have been made available for obligation beyond September 30, 1986, as provided by law.

REPORTS ON USE OF FUNDS

SEC. 5. No less frequently than once every 3 months, the President shall submit to the Congress a written report containing an accounting of any funds used pursuant to section 2 or section 3.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON CONTADORA

SEC. 6. (a) There is hereby established the National Commission on Contadora (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall—

(1) monitor and review the efforts of the Contadora nations to achieve a political resolution to the conflicts in Central America; and

(2) make recommendations with a view to building a consensus on United States policy toward Nicaragua.

(b) The Commission shall consist of an even number of members, such number to be determined jointly by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Majority Leader of the Senate, who shall each appoint half of the members of the Commission. A vacancy in the membership of the Commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(c) Not later than September 1, 1986, the Commission shall submit a report to the President and to the Congress with respect to its findings and recommendations. This report shall include—

(1) a detailed review of the status of the Contadora negotiations and United States support for those negotiations;

(2) a determination by the Commission of whether the Government of Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan opposition are facilitating the Contadora process;

(3) a recommendation on policies toward Nicaragua which the Commission believes represent a consensus that is sustainable and is supportable by the American people; and

(4) a recommendation by the Commission on whether the United States should furnish military assistance to the Nicaraguan opposition forces, including an estimate of the likely impact that furnishing such assistance would have on the Government of Nicaragua and on United States policy throughout the region.

(d) Members of the Commission shall receive no compensation on account of their service on the Commission, but while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of their duties on the Commission, shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistance, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(e)(1) The Commission may employ experts and consultants in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) Upon a request by the Commission, the head of any Federal agency may temporarily assign employees of that agency to the Commission to assist the Commission in carrying out this section.

(f) The Administrator of General Services shall provide to the Commission, on a reimburseable basis, such administrative support services as the Commission may request.

(g) Funds for the expenses incurred by the Commission in carrying out this section, including travel expenses, shall be provided by Secretary of State.

PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO NICARAGUA

SEC. 7. (a) After considering the recommendations of the National Commission on Contadora contained in the report submitted pursuant to section 6(c), the President may submit to the Congress on or after September 1, 1986, a request for authority to take specified actions with respect to Nicaragua. The request must be accompanied by—

(1) the President's assurance that he has consulted with the Contadora nations and the Contadora Support Group nations concerning the proposed actions; and

(2) a description of the response of the Contadora nations and the Contadora Support Group nations to the proposed actions.

(b)(1) The provisions of this subsection apply, during the 99th Congress, to the consideration in the House of Representatives of a joint resolution with respect to the request submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (a).

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "joint resolution" means only a joint resolution introduced within 3 legislative days after the Congress receives the request submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (a)—

(A) the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That the Congress hereby authorizes the President, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to take those actions with respect to Nicaragua which are specified in the request submitted to the Congress pursuant to the joint resolution entitled 'Joint Resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985'.";

(B) which does not have a preamble; and

(C) the title of which is as follows: "Joint Resolution relating to Nicaragua pursuant to the joint resolution entitled 'Joint Resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985'.".

(3) A joint resolution shall, upon introduction, be referred to the appropriate committee or committees of the House of Representatives.

(4) If all the committees of the House to which a joint resolution has been referred have not reported the same joint resolution by the end of 15 legislative days after the first joint resolution was introduced, any committee which has not reported the first joint resolution introduced shall be discharged from further consideration of that joint resolution and that joint resolution shall be placed on the appropriate calendar of the House.

(5)(A) At any time after the first joint resolution placed on the appropriate calendar has been on that calendar for a period of 5 legislative days, it is in order for any Member of the House (after consultation with the Speaker as to the most appropriate time for the consideration of that joint resolution) to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of that joint resolution. The motion is highly privileged and is in order even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to. All points of order against the joint resolution under clauses 2 and 6 of Rule XXI of the Rules of the House are waived. If the motion is agreed to, the resolution shall remain the unfinished business of the House until disposed of. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is disagreed to shall not be in order.

(B) Debate on the joint resolution shall not exceed ten hours, which shall be divided equally between a Member favoring and a Member opposing the joint resolution. A motion to limit debate is in order at any time in the House or in the Committee of the Whole and is not debatable.

(C) An amendment to the joint resolution is not in order.

(D) At the conclusion of the debate on the joint resolution, the Committee of the Whole shall rise and report the joint resolution back to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

(6) As used in this subsection, the term "legislative day" means a day on which the House is in session.

(7) This subsection is enacted—

(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives, and as such it is deemed a part of the Rules of the House, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in the House in the case of a joint resolution, and it supersedes other rules only to the extent that it is inconsistent with such rules; and

(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of the House to change its rules at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of the House, and of the right of the Committee on Rules to report a resolution for the consideration of any measure.

Mr. HAMILTON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] will be recognized for 1 hour and a Member opposed will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this substitute amendment.

This substitute has five parts:

First, it sets out the primary objectives of United States policy toward Central America and spells out a strategy for achieving those objectives. It gives specific suggestions as to what should be the elements of United States policy toward Nicaragua. That policy should include:

A commitment to prevent the Soviet Union and its allies from deploying an offensive military capability in Central America that directly threatens the United States;

A commitment to protect Central American nations from attack;

Pursuit of a regional settlement through all diplomatic channels; and

A willingness to use, over the long term, incentives and penalties to respond to Nicaragua's behavior.

Second, this substitute makes $27 million available for those who have been displaced by conflict in Nicaragua, to be provided by the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for refugees upon that organization's determination of need for food, medicine or other humanitarian assistance. The amendment calls for a written report from the President every 90 days containing an accounting of the funds.

Third, this substitute makes available $5 million, including the $2 million appropriated by the 1985 Supplemental Appropriations Act, for assistance to the Contadora nations to help them in reaching a regional peace settlement. It also makes available this assistance to help implement any joint border agreement between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, or Nicaragua and Honduras.

Fourth, the amendment creates a national Commission on Contadora to be appointed jointly by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the majority leader of the Senate. The Commission shall report not later than September 1, 1986, with respect to its findings on the status of the Contadora negotiations, and shall make recommendations on policies toward Nicaragua which the Commission believes represents a sustainable consensus on policy toward Nicaragua, including a recommendation on whether the United States should furnish military assistance.

In the final section of the amendment the President may, on or after September 1, 1986, request of Congress authorization to take further actions with respect to Nicaragua. A joint resolution authorizing the President to take action would be considered under expedited procedures.

WHAT ARE THE AREAS OF AGREEMENT AND DISAGREEMENT BETWEEN SUPPORTERS AND OPPONENTS OF THIS SUBSTITUTE?

A. AREAS OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Chairman, it is worth noting in this debate that there are significant and expanding areas of agreement between the Congress and the President on broad questions of Central American policy and even United States policy toward Nicaragua.

The policy language in this substitute would find wide, even unanimous, approval in this House.

We all share the goal of:

Protecting the security and territorial integrity of democracies in Central America from unlawful actions by Nicaragua;

Working together with our allies and friends to develop incentives and penalties to influence Nicaragua's behavior;

Creating a commission to follow Central American negotiations in the coming months;

Providing funds to help implement a regional peace agreement;

Pursuing a regional settlement through effective diplomacy;

Trying to isolate and contain Nicaragua's harmful external behavior;

Preserving the security of the United States by preventing the Soviet Union and its allies from developing or deploying an offensive military capability in Central America that directly threatens the United States; and Preserving our right to use unilateral military force, if necessary, to protect United States vital interests in Central America.

B. AREAS OF DISAGREEMENT

The crux of the debate today is not about goals we do share but about means to achieve those goals and it is here that there are differences.

First, we disagree on the narrow question of United States financial support to provide military aid for a group of exiles who seek to invade Nicaragua.

The substitute does not renounce military action. It supports military action to repel Nicaraguan aggression against its neighbors, to prevent the introduction of advanced weapons in the area, or to prevent the use of Nicaragua as a Soviet or Cuban base. It says that military aid to the Contras for the purpose of invading Nicaragua has not pressured the Sandinistas to make fundamental reforms—and will not.

We firmly believe that while United States goals in Nicaragua are valid, a unilateral United States military strategy will fail:

We believe that military force should not be used for the purpose of trying to overthrow the Sandinista government or for trying to pressure internal reform. Neither of these goals can be achieved with the proposed $100 million;

We believe that military force has an important role to play. It can and should be used to stop subversion or efforts by Nicaragua to undermine its neighbors; and

To assure that Nicaragua does not become a strategic threat to the United States. We must allow no Soviet bases, no Mig's, no submarines, no missiles, no weapons to threaten the region, and no military probes or incursions into the territory of Nicaragua's neighbors.

We are prepared to take whatever steps are necessary to block or to defeat such moves.

Second, we disagree with supporters of the Michel amendment about whether diplomacy and negotiation can better achieve our goals.

We must not be timid in our assessment of what diplomacy can achieve. Since the end of World War II, we have had many important successes in negotiations with Communist governments:

In the Austrian State Treaty of 1955 the Soviets surrendered territory occupied by their troops and an independent and neutral state was created;

The Berlin Quadrapartite Agreement of 1971 successfully normalized Berlin's status;

The Test-Ban Treaty of 1963, the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1970, the ABM Treaty of 1972, SALT I and SALT II each represent important steps forward in the limitation of nuclear arms;

The United States opening to China, with all of its great importance for our geostrategic position, was achieved by diplomacy, not by the force of arms;

Far more has been achieved by U.S. diplomacy than by force of arms in the postwar era.

We can achieve success in our negotiations with Nicaragua if we use the strong cards we hold in our hand:

Nicaragua is not an island. It depends on its neighbors. It cannot survive on its own. It cannot develop without trade, without normal economic relations with its neighbors and without investment from Europe, Japan, and the United States;

Nicaragua is far away from Moscow. The Soviets have not, cannot and will not guarantee Nicaragua's security. The Soviet-bloc economic organization Comecon even refused membership for Nicaragua because it does not want to support another economic basket case;

Nicaragua still has important elements in the country devoted to the betterment of its people, including the church, the private sector, and domestic political opponents, all of whom speak out with great courage;

There is a historical tide of democracy sweeping through Latin America. Virtually every country in Central America, save Nicaragua, has held free elections and experienced a peaceful transition of government in the past 2 years.

We should put our diplomacy on the side of these central realities at work in Central America and have confidence that diplomacy can succeed:

The administration wants the Sandinistas to negotiate away their power. They have not done it, and they will not do it;

The President argues that diplomacy will not work without the pressure from the Contras. But the record shows that the diplomacy has not worked with the pressure of the Contras;

Every good negotiator knows that you have to give some incentives to the other party if you want a successful negotiation;

We should address security issues before trying to pressure the Sandinistas into being more democratic. Such a strategy offers the Sandinistas a way out and offers diplomacy a real chance;

Diplomacy cannot succeed as long as the United States insists on fundamental changes in the Sandinista regime as a prior condition to an agreement;

Negotiations cannot and will not succeed if the objective is to apply military pressure to try to cause the Sandinista government to commit political suicide;

The more promising approach is that in exchange for a guarantee by the Sandinistas not to threaten United States or Central American security—no Soviet bases and no export of revolution—the United States would stop military help for the Contras;

We can complete a treaty with Nicaragua limiting Nicaragua's military reach, and its Soviet and Cuban ties. Then, with our friends in the region we can start pressing the Sandinistas along a better internal path;

Our incentive to the Sandinistas is that we let them survive, if they change their external behavior;

Over the long term, we can have confidence that Nicaragua will be unable to resist the tide of democracy in Latin America.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED SINCE THE RESUMPTION OF AID TO THE CONTRAS?

Last year this body voted to resume aid to the Contras. At the time of the debate we warned what would happen if the assistance were approved. What we said would happen, did happen:

We said that aid would lead to more bloodshed. And it has;

We said that aid would only lead to a continued stalemate. And it has;

We said that aid to the Contras would make regional support for U.S. policy harder to obtain. Latin governments are now more outspoken in criticism of U.S. policy;

We said aid to the Contras would confirm the Communist leanings of the Sandinista government. The President himself now refers to them as Communists;

We said aid to the Contras would increase tensions between Nicaragua and Honduras. News of border incursions now fill the headlines;

We said aid to the Contras would lead to deeper American involvement. United States helicopters last month ferried Honduran troops to the war zones along the Nicaraguan border;

We said aid to the Contras was a military solution to a problem that must be solved politically. Can anyone now doubt this? We have seen escalation, more bloodshed and continuing stalemate;

We said aid to the Contras would make negotiations more remote. No progress has been made in negotiations. The lesson of the past year is that Contadora negotiations cannot succeed while Contra war continues.

WHAT NEXT

There is an important question which all supporters of military assistance for the Contras must try to answer when they vote for military assistance: What happens if this military aid package for the Contras fails and does not accomplish the purposes its supporters suggest it will achieve? What next?

The Reagan administration will not answer that question. It does not want to address it.

I do not know the answer, but I can give three hints of what is likely to happen based on the words of the President and on recent history.

First, our adversaries in Nicaragua will react to United States military assistance. When the United States steps up its aid to the Contras, the Soviet Union and Cuba will step up their aid to the Sandinistas. The administration assumes that our move will be the last move. But it will not be the last move. There will be further ratcheting upward of the conflict.

Second, even with this $100 million, the Contra force simply is not a suitable instrument for protecting the U.S. national interest.

One of the clearest points in all this discussion is the inadequacy of the President's program to accomplish his objectives. The Contras, even with aid, have no chance of victory, and a stalemate will not pressure the Sandinistas to make fundamental reforms. The administration demands victory, but is unwilling to commit the resources to achieve it. It sets forth ambitious goals, and provides only modest means.

Gen. Paul Gorman, before retiring as commander of the U.S. Southern Command, stated in February 1985 that a Contra overthrow of the Sandinista government was not "feasible in the near future" with U.S. financial assistance, and that such military pressure would take "years" to produce results. Senior military officers attest to the inadequacy of the President's military program to accomplish any realistic military objectives;

After listening to the testimony of many witnesses, my judgment is that the Contras cannot overthrow the Sandinistas, even with $100 million in aid; and that it will take the intervention of U.S. forces to topple the Sandinistas. I have every reason to believe that the intelligence community agrees with that judgment;

The President accurately states much of his and our criticism of the Sandinista government. But he is blind to the weaknesses and faults of the Contras;

We have provided to date some $100 million to the Contras. But in 4 years they have yet to demonstrate their military effectiveness. Their force of 20,000 does not control a single town or village. They control less territory than ever before. They stay primarily in safe haven in Honduras, and wage war largely against civilian targets;

Some of their leaders have democratic credentials, but they are commanded primarily by former Somoza national guardsmen;

Their tactics of terror and human rights abuses have been repeatedly documented by independent groups;

In short, there are too many questions about the Contras relating to their political viability, adherence to democracy, military performance, respect to human rights, and regional support for the United States to invest heavily in them;

This $100 million is only the downpayment on a war, the first payment on a long-term debt. Many more payments will come due if we expand the current war by providing military assistance to the Contras.

Third, we see what can be down the road if the Michel amendment is approved by examining carefully the words of the President. He is quoted in his report of April 1985 as follows:

> Direct application of United States military force • • • must realistically be recognized as an eventual option, given our stakes in the region, if other policy alternatives fail.

That statement has never been denied or retracted.

The Michel amendment will lift restrictions on CIA and DOD participation in the Contra war and will bring American military advisors into Central America to train the Contras. It will put American soldiers shoulder to shoulder with the Contras;

The President has said that he does not plan to send United States troops to Nicaragua, and I have no doubt that he does not intend to do so. But, I submit, the announced goals of the President, his commitment to those goals, the predictable response of our adversaries, the chances of accident and miscalculation all raise the risks of deeper American military involvement. The logic inexorably points in that direction;

Nicaragua has become the acid test of the Reagan doctrine. If the Contras cannot achieve the President's goals, and I share the assessment that they cannot for the foreseeable future, then the United States will have to face the question of military intervention.

Present policy sets us on a course of no win and high risk. Present policy has demonstrably failed to achieve its goals. We need a better policy.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support of this substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. LEVIN of Michigan). The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] has consumed 13 minutes.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to one of the outstanding Members of this House and a veteran member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman and my friends, Members of the House, I listened earlier to the majority whip talk about how the American people are against this. I suppose he knows that by the polls we have seen published, and I will concede the figures do not indicate a lot of support for supporting the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. We all can read the numbers.

I suggest, however, we know how polls are taken and we know that in formulating the question we can almost elicit the answer we are looking for.

Do you support the counterrevolutionaries in their effort to overturn the Government of Nicaragua, which we recognize? One cannot be an outlaw, of course, if you do not support that.

Do you support the freedom fighters, who are indigenous Nicaraguans seeking to reestablish a democracy and have free elections and freedom of the press against the Marxist-Leninist government? Of course we are for that.

It depends upon how one asks the question. In your career as a legislator, sometimes you are called upon to be a thermostat and not a thermometer. Sometimes you are called upon to do some leadership and not some followship. That takes guts. That takes courage. And sometimes it is in short supply.

One of the great fallacies of this entire argument is repeated again and again and again by the gentlemen on the left who oppose negotiating from strength with the Communist Sandinistas, and that is, the Contras cannot win a military victory. If you get in an argument, he who defines it has it half won, and they choose to set up this straw man of a military victory and saying the Contras cannot win one; ergo, we should not support them. There will just be a lot of empty, needless bloodletting.

I am going to try to say it as clearly and as simply as I can. Nobody is looking for a military victory. What we are looking for is a combination of pressures, a triad if you will: Military pressure from the Contras; economic pressure hopefully from ourselves and other countries who will learn, if we will ever get some backbone and support the Contras, that we are in there for the long haul. We are on the side of freedom. We are not on the side of surrender and capitulation and temporizing and appeasement.

We are there to support Nicaraguans who are fighting for freedom in their own country, not as our proxies. They are willing to fight and die. They have been doing it. We have not sent them a rifle. We have not sent them a slingshot. They are in there dying right now. They are not our proxies.

The proxies are the Bulgarians, the North Koreans, the Libyans, the PLO, the Russians, and the Cubans. The Sandinistas are their proxies. So let us get our terminology straight.

Military victory, no. By military pressure, combined with economic pressure, combined with diplomatic pressure, that is what got Somoza out of there. There was no big military victory. The OAS finally saw where we were. Finally we stopped vacillating and we said he has got to go, just like we said Marcos has to go, and that is why Somoza left. There was no military victory, but a combination of military pressure.

Now you take that element off the table and what are you left with? Resolutions from Contradora?

You negotiate from strength and you negotiate from weakness, and that is the choice.

The problem with your proposals of negotiating is you want us to stop supporting the Contras, and God knows I wish we were supporting the Contras, and trust the Sandinistas. Why, they even lied about the incursion into Honduras. They denied they even went over the border.

Now if there was some reciprocity, if the Sandinistas say you stop funding the Contras and we will get the Cubans out, we will get the Bulgarians out, we will reduce our military services, that would make some sense. But what you are proposing is unilateral disarmament in a place where you have expansionist aggressive Marxist/Leninists who, by definition, have to subvert everyplace around there.

Diplomacy has not worked with pressure from the Contras. What pressure from the Contras? They have been fighting there with nothing, with nothing. Let us see how diplomacy works with pressure from the Contras. If you think taking the Contras out of the equation is going to help the side of freedom, you are a raving optimist.

I suggest that if this was such a popular government in Nicaragua on October 15, instead of taking away the civil rights of the whole country, they would have rallied the country behind them. If the Contras are so ineffective, why on October 15 did they have to take away the civil rights of the whole country and have a state of emergency? If they are so beloved and represent the aspirations of the compesinos, they should not have to shut the church, confiscate the presses, turn off the church radio station, give La Prensa nothing to print by censorship, and draft kids into their party army—that is not even the Nicaraguan Army, that is the party of the Sandinistas, it is their army drafting seminarians in there. How do you tolerate that? And you want to do nothing, nothing.

God, you are the party of Ramsey Clark and George McGovern.

Containment, that is a great idea. Boy, if the Soviets move in there, we will be down there. Yes. you will be down there like we were in Cuba.

What will happen is they built Puenta Huerte, and they have all of the heavy Soviet aircraft, and we will argue up here whether those are really just in for training or not. Then they build a deepwater seaport at El Bluff, and we will argue among ourselves as to whether that is for "Love Boat" to dock conveniently. And then if anybody wants to do anything with it, we will have the War Powers Act all over the lot.

Containment is a great idea. Let them go Communist and we will contain them, just like we did in Afghanistan, and in Camranh Bay and everything else.

No, if you want to have a Soviet base down there, as we have in Cuba, then continue to do nothing.

I say we cannot tolerate another Soviet base in this hemisphere, and the time to do something is while we have got some people down there willing to fight and die for their freedom.

The Hamilton amendment says if you want to eat, leave home, cross the border, and become a refugee.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON] one of the cosponsors of this amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for allowing me to offer this amendment with him. It is an honor to do so.

I think reciting the arguments in support of the Hamilton/Richardson amendment, as many have done, is not the way to go. I think it is best when you deal with an issue like this to speak from your own experience. And the experience, the most recent one that I had with this issue, was attending the Contadora meetings in Panama.

I feel very strongly after having come back from that meeting that this is the best way to go. I say so because I think I share, I do not know if it is a distinct honor, of having been with about 50 other Members having voted against aid to the Contras in the early stages, having then proceeded to support humanitarian aid to the Contras, and now moving into a position where I firmly believe that the approach the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] is taking is the correct one.

I feel very strongly in looking at some of the Contadora foreign ministers that we have to have faith in their commitment toward peace. I saw four men, foreign ministers, committed to a peace process. I saw them asking us for more time. I heard them tell us please give us an opportunity for more discussion and more deliberation.

I say that if there is this commitment from these men, and these nations for peace, I would say that if we give them more time, it is possible that we can proceed with peace.

The Sandinistas were heavily involved in hurting those talks in Panama, there is no question about it. But I think undermining the process was our policy of aiding the Contras.

In the same vein, I feel very strongly that the Contadora peace process is the last chance for peace. It is the last chance to avoid war, and I feel it should be given this last breath of hope.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from Arkansas.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I publicly endorse and support the pending amendment. I would like to be shown as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The centerpiece of Mr. Reagan's foreign policy is the administration's strategy in Central America. It is a policy of U.S. support for movements of national liberation against incompatible governments, both Communist and non-Communist. That is to say, that the Reagan administration has adopted a policy of overthrowing governments that it can not get along with.

The direction of United States policy in Latin America will affect United States relations in the Western Hemisphere well into the next decade. What have we achieved over the last 4 years. The current policy has cost us $3.4 billion in Central America. The United States has associated itself and even sponsored criminals who have killed thousands of innocent people. We have reports of defection, corruption, and failure from the Contras that we have sponsored. Why have the Contras failed? Because these Contras are not freedom fighters; the Contras are not fighting for a cause; they are working for the Yankee dollar.

Mr. Reagan's policy is wrong today for the same reasons it was wrong a year ago. My reasons for opposition to this policy have been stated before and need not be recited again. On April 10, 1985, I addressed the School of Latin American Affairs of Stanford University at Palo Alto, CA, on this subject. For the RECORD I submit my remarks. My objections are the same today as a year ago:

U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA: AN ALTERNATIVE TO WAR

(Address by Hon. William Alexander)

(Stanford University Palo Alto, California April 10, 1985)

Dr. Wirth, Ladies and Gentlemen, before the end of the month, Congress will vote on a request by President Reagan for $14 million in aid for the guerrilla army fighting to overthrow the government of Nicaragua.

While the amount of the aid request may seem relatively insignificant, this vote is in reality a vote on the overall direction of American foreign policy in Latin America for well into the next decade.

During a recent trip to Central America. I had dinner with one of Mr. Reagan's most ideological ambassadors. At one point I asked him what Latin America would look like if the Reagan Administration were 100 percent successful in pursuing its foreign policy objectives. What kind of society . . . what kind of an economy . . . what kind of government would we see in that part of the world if Mr. Reagan's vision became a reality.

The Ambassador thought for a moment—almost as if he had never even considered the question—and he said, "Congressman, it would be like things were down here in the 1950's—commerce was flourishing, the people loved and respected Americans, and there was a general sense of contentment with things."

After spending most of my life in or around politics, I am not astounded at anything very often. But this response was astounding.

To me it seems that it was the social and economic condition in Latin America in the 1950's that gave rise to the political upheaval of the 1960's and 1970's. The vestiges of that period are still having their impact today. The 50's were years marked by extraordinary repression and deprivation for most Latin peoples. There was rampant poverty and disease for most, while economic prosperity and political power resided in the hands of a relative handful of fortunate families.

The governments of these nations could be described variously as "tin horn dictatorships" and "banana republics . . ." most bought and paid for through outside forces—mostly in the United States.

For many years, we in this country enjoyed a comfortable, paternalistic relationship with these nations. However, slowly we began to see a threat to that relationship spawned by a growing restlessness. We Americans saw a threat to our security in Latin America—and we focused our fears on the appearance of Marxism.

It would be easy to let the story end there. It would be far more simple to adopt the view—as has been adopted by the Reagan Administration—that Marxism is the cause of all evil in Central and South America . . . and if we could just contain that movement all would be right again.

That is a convenient view but not one firmly rooted in reality.

Latin America—and especially those nations in Central America—is a series of unique nations undergoing an inevitable transition. In every one of those countries there is a process underway in which an old order is failing, and a new order is coming to power.

In Central America the symbol of this process of transition is Nicaragua. Somoza and his loyalists stayed well beyond their time, lost touch with the public, undercut the moderate opposition, allowed the center to be destroyed, and created conditions that permitted revolution by extremists to dominate the opposition. When Somoza ultimately fled, there was no popular-based moderate force to fill the void.

Other nations in Central America are undergoing a similar process of change. The traditional alliances between the landed oligarchy, political elites and military commanders are encountering greater and greater difficulty in controlling events.

The questions are what new alliances and systems will take over, whether they will be consistent with the interests and values of the United States, and what policies will best serve those interests and values under these conditions of change.

Basically, the nations of Central America are members of the Western rather than the Eastern world, and should be more open to the Western than Eastern models. There is no reason that the United States cannot successfully help these nations along this course.

The challenge faced by the United States is to develop policies which carefully define and effectively protect U.S. national interests in the long term, and work comprehensively to support pluralistic and stable new structures in Central America.

Given the strategic and psychological importance of Central America to the United States, we must clearly define these goals and objectives.

The essential institutional requirements will differ somewhat from one nation to another, but will include:

1. Development of respect for the rule of law and human rights.
2. Creation of political institutions that allow and encourage citizen participation.
3. Emphasis on building up human resources through education, training and other means.
4. Development of region-wide cooperation.

The most practical way to achieve U.S. objectives is to help Central American nations deal with one another, and to help them solve internal problems through negotiations rather than militarism and violence. We should support change through democratization and peace through diplomacy, seeking a region-wide system of economic cooperation and open trading markets.

Progressive policy-makers in this country must realize that monolithic communism in Latin America has failed. Cuba is a virtual economic client state of the Eastern bloc countries.

The real enemies of the United States' interests in Latin America are disease, hunger and poverty. These are the forces that could well defeat our most well-intentioned initiative.

Last Thursday afternoon, President Reagan was doing what he does best as he stood before a national television audience and attempted to sell a peace plan. The President argued his case for increasing aid to the guerrillas in Nicaragua by conjuring up a world view completely at odds with reality. He recast the situation in Central America in such a way as to argue that—in Orwell's words—"war is peace."

Mr. Reagan reiterated his support for peace and democracy in Central America. He repeated his opposition to the spread of communism . . . and I speak for all in my party when I applaud these goals.

Unfortunately, we cannot support the means by which the President hopes to achieve these goals. His thinking is rooted deep in the world of the 1950's. Instead of providing an incentive for peace, his proposal is an invitation to greater violence and a further step away from the processes of change taking place in Latin America today.

There is nothing new in what the President said last week. The essential realities remain the same. The President wants Congress to give its approval to his war against the Nicaraguan government. It is a new face on an old horror.

This new proposal for negotiations is a very sophisticated subterfuge. Do not be fooled . . . it is a ploy . . . a ploy designed to give Mr. Reagan what he wants, and that is official sanction from Congress to fight a war in Nicaragua.

Mr. Reagan wants Congress to approve $14 million for the "Reaganistas," which he says will only be used initially for "humanitarian support." The leadership of the House has been advised that the Administration defines "humanitarian" as inclusive of trucks, uniforms and other logistical support short of actual guns and bullets.

Mr. Reagan says that only if the negotiations break down will he convert the so-called "humanitarian aid" to military assistance.

This proposal insults the intelligence of Members of Congress and the American people—under the Reagan plan, the Reaganistas are guaranteed $14 million if they walk away from the negotiations table. They have no incentive to try to achieve some sort of settlement. Clearly, Mr. Reagan developed this plan as a roundabout way of getting his aid request through Congress—a request he was told by leaders of his own party on Wednesday ". . . was dead in the water."

Mr. Reagan would have Americans take their eyes off the ball. He would divert our attention away from the real issues. Mr. Reagan does not want peaceful solution in Nicaragua. He will not tolerate the presence of the Sandinistas in a government there. He is using a suggestion of peace to induce support for a policy of war.

The real question here is "Why is the United States involved militarily in Nicaragua in the first place?" Mr. Reagan has given us the answer time and time again—we are there to overthrow the Sandinista Government. Mr. Reagan has repeatedly said that he will not tolerate "another Cuba" in Latin America. On several occasions, including his speech last Thursday, he referred to the Sandinistas as thugs or murderers. Are we to believe that he has changed his position? That he is now willing to tolerate their continued presence there?

Mr. Reagan—in that speech last week—tried to pass himself off as the compassionate peacemaker in a war which he has helped create. The Reaganistas army exists largely because Mr. Reagan has provided it with the means to fight a war of bedevilment against the Sandinista government. The Reaganistas are essentially an American mercenary army—and Mr. Reagan is asking the Congress and the American people to give their official support to that cause.

Mr. Reagan and his supporters suggest that gunboat diplomacy will bring democracy to Latin America. However, history does not support that conclusion. Instead, history demonstrates that democracy in Latin America has taken hold only when democratic structures offered real hope for coming to terms with poverty, disease and despair that plagues Latin societies. Mr. Reagan should understand that no amount of military aid, that no increase in arms will be big enough to make democracy work in Latin America. Our foreign policy in Latin America will only succeed when we align our objectives with those of the people of the region. Then there can be hope. Then there can be true progress.

Contrary to the claims of the President, U.S. policy in Central America is out of control—lacking in direction and substance. We are wasting millions upon millions of dollars, while needlessly placing at risk the lives of brave American soldiers along with countless other Latin civilians.

Mr. Reagan is transfixed by an antiquated view of Latin America, wholly inconsistent with modern realities. His policies make it more likely that we Americans will repeat the mistakes of the past than to learn from them. Gunboat diplomacy did not work in the 1950's—it is not likely to succeed today.

Is the United States going to fulfill the fear of Simon Bolivar, the George Washington of Latin America, who worried that:

"Los Estados Unidos paracen destinados . . . plagar a las Americas de miseriea e nombre de la libertad.

"The United States appears destined . . . to plague the Americas with misery in the name of freedom."

Or, are we going to provide the leadership which is the mark of a great nation?

I urge those in my party to look at the constructive, positive alternatives available to our nation. Mr. Reagan would have us resort to a policy which substitutes military action for diplomacy. I cannot endorse that. The opportunities for a comprehensive diplomatic settlement in Central America are real and available. Let us offer words of hope rather than threats of war.

To achieve a long term settlement in this region, I suggest the following:

1. The full force and power of the United States should be placed in support of the Contradora negotiations. There should remain no doubt in the minds of the leaders of the Contradora nations, and others throughout Latin America that the United States is taking every possible step and using all possible leverage in support of an end to the bloodshed through the use of diplomacy.

The example of President Bellisario Bettancur of Colombia is important. Through diplomatic leadership, personal courage and good faith, President Bettancur has begun to bring peace to Colombia by negotiating with his opponents. The United States should fully support his efforts and other similar efforts, to negotiate an end to the region-wide violence.

2. The Administration should work with Congress in a bi-partisan effort to devise a significant foreign assistance program, directed toward the following objectives:

a. To support the creation or improvement of institutions designed to strengthen the administration of justice and the democratic process.

b. To improve education and training programs including projects within Central American nations and student exchange programs between those nations and the United States.

c. To improve local infrastructure (e.g., transportation) as an aid to economic development.

d. To improve local health care.

e. To support economic cooperation projects, movements toward inter-American economic integration, and a more open regional trading system.

f. To support local agricultural projects, and to promote export of American agricultural products.

g. To improve training of armed forces, respect for human rights by military personnel, and defensive military capabilities.

3. The Administration might approach friends and allies in Latin America and Europe to propose that the above program involve joint funding as part of an international "democratic initiative."

The policy stated above could be implemented by taking the following steps:

1. The United States should put its full force and power behind the Contradora initiative undertaken by Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela.

2. The United States should offer to support, promote, or organize a general hemispheric peace conference, which would focus on the major disputed questions of the Americas, should the Contadora heads of state conclude that such a conference would contribute to the search for peace.

3. The United States should express a willingness to work with any nation, through Contadora, a hemispheric peace conference, or any other appropriate forum that professes an interest in pursuing non-violent solutions to the crises in Central America. The United States, working with and through the Contadora nations, should test the sincerity of claims by Cuban President Fidel Castro that he will take strong action in support of the Contadora process. U.S. policy towards Cuba should avoid the mistaken extremes of naive optimism or blind paranoia and instead should offer a willingness to pursue careful, realistic and tough-minded diplomacy in search of gradual lessening of U.S.-Cuban tensions.

In 1945 the Soviet Union emerged from World War II as a superpower in sole competition with the United States for influence among the developing nations. The Soviets were eager to demonstrate the merits of communism as an economic system. During the forty years that have elapsed, Marxism is failing and has succeeded only as a process of distribution, unable to compete with capitalism in production. Committed Marxists continue to flirt with the U.S. and the Western World:

The Peoples Republic of China (PRC) turned to the West in 1978, adapting capitalistic methods in order to increase productivity;

Cuba's Fidel Castro, a disciple of Marxism, describes the "China Model" as a goal for future Cuban-U.S. relations;

North Korea hints a coming to terms with South Korea in exchange for economic ties with the U.S. and Japan;

Vietnam increases its cooperation with the U.S. to discover and return MIA's lost in the conflict;

Ethiopia turns to the U.S. and Europe for food to relieve famine;

And, Mozambique and Angola look to the U.S. to broker deals with South Africa.

Indeed, the United States has a unique opportunity to lure Third World States away from the influence of the Soviet Union to the capitalist orbit. But, we must seize the initiative to take advantage of the opportunity that exists at this time of generational change within the Kremlin.

Democratic capitalism can compete ideologically in the Third World with Marxist Communism. Militaristic competition between the U.S. and U.S.S.R. appears inevitable; however, armed conflict need not be a solution when dealing with Soviet client states. The success of capitalism as a superior system of productivity demonstrates that the Marxist ideology of the Soviet Union is not, per se, a threat to the United States.

The triumph of capitalism continues simultaneously with the tragic lessons learned by the failure of militarism. This week marks the tenth year of the defeat of militarism as a policy in Vietnam. We must develop a policy that is not rooted in the brute force of militarism but instead builds upon the sucess of capitalism.

"To live bravely by convictions in which the free peoples of this world can take heart, the American people must put their faith in stable, long range policies—political, economic, and military—programs that will not be heated and cooled with the brightening and waning of tension.

"The United States has matured to world leadership; it is time we steered by the stars, not by the lights of each passing ship." (General Omar Bradley, 1945).

President Reagan's position on Central America is not a policy—it is a tactic. Moreover, it is outmoded because of the heavy reliance upon militarism.

Most knowledgable observers agree that militarism is not a solution in Central America inasmuch as it does not address the problems of poverty, disease, malnutrition, social injustice and political corruption.

A long-term solution requires a long-term policy that addresses the aspirations of the people of the Central American region. A return to the military dictatorships of the past ignores the problems and prolongs the conflict. And, a U.S. policy is bound to fail which violates American traditions and values.

"In the great struggle against Communism, we must find our strength by developing and applying our own principles, not in abandoning them." (Walter Lippmann, 1962).

It is time to stop squandering billions of dollars; needlessly wasting lives, and alienating our allies; and to gain control of U.S. foreign policy in a positive and meaningful way that serves America's best interest—peace through Democracy.

Thank you.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. When the gentleman was at Contadora, as I recall from reading a newspaper account, the Cubans were advising the Nicaraguans, and because the Nicaraguans did not get what they wanted, they left Contadora; they walked out of the meeting; is that correct?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is correct. The Cubans were there.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. They were there.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think in the same vein, I feel very strongly that there are two elements there; the Cubans' proxy forces and our support for the Contras that doomed the talks; but the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. The Cubans were advising them and they did leave the talks?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the Hamilton substitute says—he will offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute that provides $27 million for programs to assist refugees—and make no mistake about it, if there is no military assistance for the Contras, there will be many more refugees, and we are going to have to appropriate a lot more than $27 million to help them. We will probably have to erect road signs, directing them north toward the United States to freedom; and second, it will appropriate $2 million for continuing the Contadora process.

The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON], who just spoke on this floor, acknowledged the fact that when he was at a Contadora meeting, the Cubans were advising the Nicaraguans, and because the Nicaraguans did not get what they wanted out of Contadora, they got up and left.

We are going to provide $2 million more for that process? It makes no sense to me. The only thing that Communists down in Nicaragua understand is power. They are not going to negotiate away their power voluntarily. We are going to have to put pressure on them both diplomatically and militarily, and that is what President Reagan wants to do with his two-track approach.

Let us look at the facts. The facts are there are 19 countries south of the Mexican-American border; 12 of those countries have either terrorists or guerrillas trained in Managua or weapons that came through Managua, or both. There is a cancer in Central America and it is called the Communist Nicaraguan Government.

If they really wanted to negotiate, if they were really concerned, they would show good faith by cutting off aid to the Communist guerrillas in these 12 countries; but they are not doing that. What they are doing is continuing to support them and continuing to export revolution, even though they are getting some pressure from the Contras right now.

I submit to my colleagues that if we do not give any assistance to the freedom fighters, the Communists will prevail, and this exportation of revolution that is taking place right now in 12 of the 19 countries in Central and Latin America will turn into a tidal wave of Communist subversion. They will be subverting these governments, undermining these fledgling democracies to such an extent that we will have to be involved not only in the Nicaraguan problem, but in a myriad of problems throughout Central and all of Latin America.

My colleagues, I cannot believe we are adopting or trying to adopt this head-in-the-sand approach. The Communists have told us time and again what their objectives are. Thomas Borge, Umberto Ortega, Daniel Ortega have said time and again, "We want revolution without borders. Our revolution has always been international.

I do not understand why my colleagues cannot see that. I was in Chalatenango Province in northern El Salvador, and I talked to a captured Communist guerrilla, and he told me face to face that the training for his people was coming out of Managua that the weapons were coming out of Managua. I walked outside and I saw the weapons.

There is no doubt that they are exporting revolution. Now, the only pressure that we can exert upon them is by helping the freedom fighters put pressure on them internally. In addition to that, those freedom fighters deserve the opportunity; the opportunity to have freedom restored in their country.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to summarize by saying that, "Don't just take my word for these things." Mr. Baldizon, whom I talked about earlier today, the right hand man of Thomas Borge, has talked about time and again the disinformation tactics of the Communist Sandinista government. They are doing everything they can to mold public opinion within the confines of the United States; and I think they have been somewhat successful.

Because of that, we have a real problem here. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] said a few moments ago: "Sometimes we have to lead, instead of following public opinion," and I think this is one of those times.

We have to tell our friends in Central America who are fighting for fledgling democracies we are going to support them. We have to tell the freedom fighters in Nicaragua we are going to give them the tools that are necessary to bring about the promises, to realize the promises that were made by the Communist Sandinistas in 1979 when they took power. They promised free elections, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, and freedom of the press.

We owe those fighting for freedom in Central America a chance to realize those promises. we must not turn our back on them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND].

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Hamilton-Richardson amendment.

We have debated the Nicaraguan issue over and over again during the last 3 years—the last time, only 3 weeks ago. In those debates, and the votes which have followed, we have made our differences on this issue quite clear. But it is important to emphasize that we differ not over what our policy goals should be in Nicaragua and Central America but in the way those goals should be achieved.

On March 20, this House rejected President Reagan's request to provide military assistance to the Contras. In my judgment, that was the proper course of action for us to take. Today, we reconsider that vote. Has there been a material change in the situation in Nicaragua since March 20 that necessitates a reversal of our position? I would suggest that there has not. Some have argued that the Sandinista incursion into Honduras, and the inability of the Contadora nations to agree on a peace plan make a compelling case for American military aid to the Contras. The Sandinista military operation in Honduras was nothing new. Sandinista forces have pursued the Contras in Honduras before and without an agreement insuring the integrity of the Honduras-Nicaragua border may very well do so again. Rather that justifying American military aid perhaps this incident should cause us to consider whether the presence of the United States backed Contras in Honduras brings us closer to war, or closer to peace, in Central America.

It is true that the Contadora process has not as yet yielded a peace agreement. It is also true that that process is not over, it might very well benefit from the perception among its participants that the United States is acting in a way which will facilitate rather than impede its work. Our allies among the Contadora group and the support group have made it quite clear that our assistance to the Contras does not help their efforts to negotiate with the Sandinistas.

Negotiation or an assuredly escalating level of fighting is our choice today. The Hamilton-Richardson amendment seeks to remove an impediment to a negotiated settlement while recognizing our responsibilities to those made refugees by the fighting. It seeks to provide the Contadora process with the moral and material support it needs to fairly test its ability as a vehicle for a political solution to the varied concerns of our Latin American neighbors. I do not believe that our current Nicaraguan policy gives that kind of test. We have nothing to lose and everything to gain by giving Contadora a real chance to work, and I believe that the Hamilton-Richardson amendment best provides that opportunity.

The Contras are our other choice, and the alternatives to Hamilton-Richardson in varying degrees embody that selection. Let us be clear about the Contras. They cannot, for $100 million or any sum remotely close to it, accomplish what I believe most would agree are our policy objectives in Nicaragua. They cannot keep Nicaragua from becoming a base for advanced Soviet weapons or prevent the Sandinistas from exporting their revolution to their neighbors. Those jobs can only be done by the United States and our Latin American allies. No surrogates can do them for us and experience forcefully suggests that the Contras even fortified by $100 million in U.S. assistance, can neither alter the repressive aspects of Sandinista rule nor coerce Daniel Ortega to the bargaining table. If anything, the Contras make those goals less achievable. No, $100 million does not buy a Contra victory. It buys continued fighting to no apparent conclusion. It represents not the end but merely the first installment of the U.S. aid that will be necessary to sustain the Contras as a fighting force. And most ominous of all it binds the Contras to us with ties of dependence so strong as to, in my judgment, assure the use of American forces if the Contras are at some point in the future faced with certain defeat. We have traveled that road before, Mr. Chairman, and I for one do not propose to travel it again.

And so we must choose between assisting Contadora and assisting the Contras. The evidence is clear that we cannot do both. We must decide which is most likely to further our interests and the interests of the Central and South American democracies with whom we are allied. I believe that the overwhelming sentiment among the leaders of those countries is for Contadora and negotiations rather than for the Contras. That should be our choice as well. The Hamilton-Richardson amendment gives us the opportunity to effect that choice and I urge its adoption.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished and veteran Member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the Chairman.

The President of the United States told our Nation the day before yesterday that if this House engages in subterfuge or back-room deals to thwart a straight clean up-or-down vote on this issue, that this body would be responsible for getting freedom fighters killed in Central America. And I agree with the President's analysis. That is what makes this discussion here today so very serious.

Now there were very few single issues in this House that would cause the defeat of Members on both sides of the aisle, no matter what side of the issue they take, and this is such an issue.

I characterized this vote earlier today as basically a human rights discussion. I stick by that characterization.

My distinguished colleagues on the other side who try at every turn, even through political intrigue here in the House via parliamentary procedures to thwart the President's policy, I think they led with their best efforts saying that the people the President and I call freedom fighters were guilty of human rights violations.

However, they have never been able to effectively develop that case with hard evidence. I just have not seen it, as hard as they have tried.

But on the other side, the prison system in Nicaragua alone, not just suppression of the press and religious persecution of the Jewish community, the Protestant fundamentalists or the evangelicals and of my own Catholic Church, severe, grievous persecution, that alone is not what makes this a human rights issue. It is this massive prison system, this Communist mini-Gulag system mirroring the prison camps of eastern Europe and Siberia, should be enough to make those opposing Contra aid, rethink their views.

This map is too small for my colleagues visiting up in the higher seats of our Chamber or in the back of the Chamber to see and I know that our camerawork is somewhat limited. But suffice it to say that the camps start up in the northeast corner of the country at Puerto Cabezas, run all the way over to Chinandega, in the northwest corner of the country, Esteli which has a major camp, an area which was the scene of Soviet helicopters flown by Castro's pilots, first made their combat moves on the continent of North America. The square footage of prison space since Somoza fled that country has increased five- to six-fold. Here now I begin the ignominious litany that for the life of me I cannot understand does not shift dozens of votes of my well-meaning distinguished colleagues on the other side of the aisle.

The first prison is Puerto Cabezas. Please bear in mind that these are United States-garnered intelligence images that I swear by my life are correct. They were classified top secret only a few weeks ago. And because of the importance of this debate, Members, not of the other body, but of this Chamber literally almost begged on our knees for the administration to declassify this or they would have a defeat on their hands knowing we did not try to convince the 62 percent of our fellow Americans who do not even understand which side we are on.

The next one is in Esteli. That camp was formed before the Soviet-manufactured, Castro-pilot-flown gunships began to kill young men and women fighting in the name of freedom, closer to my home in California than we are right now.

This prison did not exist at Waswali while Somoza was raping his country of a not-so-small part of its treasure. Club Hipico, this is no Club Med for vacationing Americans, my friends. This is another camp where people, naked in solitary confinement, are tortured because they tried to develop in Nicaragua what we simply call our first amendment, that government should make no law restricting their freedom of speech, of the right of the people to assemble in the private sector, or the right of people to freely practice their religion.

Here is that Chinandega prison. I do not have two of the prisons.

Here is Palo Alto prison. This is not a photograph, my distinguished colleagues on the majority side, of the campus of Stanford in middle California. This is another prison of a large chain of prisons, which were built and now hold 11,000 people. Keep in mind that the sources you most quote, Amnesty International and America's Watch, have told me to my face that at the high-water mark Somoza had 500 prisoners, not 11,000 to 13,000.

Here is La Palmera, a prison near Grenada, one of the three largest cities in Nicaragua.

Nobody even in the city of Grenada is allowed within 100 yards of that prison. And here is the one I find most interesting because this is the one that is in the flight pattern at Sandino Airport. I cannot emphasize how many dozens of American Congressmen have been flown over this prison, enlarged five times just in the last 4 years. In this prison people are held in solitary confinement cells, naked, only for speaking out for the promises of the original Sandinista revolution. Despite this our planes continue to bring American Congressmen to this country, overflying these prisons.

They wonder in the Zona Franca Prison, as they wonder in Tipitapa, which was Somoza's only federal penitentiary for his political prisoners, which has four or five times as many people languishing in these Communist cells, which would be the flight of a key American, bringing a key Member of Congress from the majority side, who could stand as a noble American before this body and say that the evidence is now overwhelming "I was wrong. I do not ask you for forgiveness because my main motivating drive was to protect human rights. I thought the Contras were the main violators but I found out that these Sandinista Communists, these commandantes make Somoza truly look like a tin-hat dictator. These people are serious and deadly Communist brothers of Mu'ammar Qadhafi in Libya."

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HYDE. The gentleman must admit, though, there is a sort of logic to the Hamilton-Barnes-Richardson amendment because it recognizes that once we cut the legs out from the Contra military effort there will be a flood of refugees and we are now moving into the refugee business under the aegis of the U.N. You have heard of the U.N., that outfit in New York that is so balanced and fair.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The U.N. hates refugees.

Mr. HYDE. Now the rule of thumb on Communist countries is that 10 percent of the people flee. That is what we got out of Cuba in the Mariel boatlift. So 10 percent of 3 million people is 300,000 people. Have we consulted Honduras and Costa Rica about how they are going to absorb the flood of refugees that this magnet will attract? Does the gentleman know of any efforts that have been made, say, by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence or the Democratic leadership?

Mr. DORNAN of California. None whatsoever.

Mr. HYDE. Does the gentleman know whether they have inquired of Honduras whether they can absorb, let us say, half of the 300,000, 150,000 refugees from Nicaragua and Costa Rica? Does the gentleman know of any exploration along those lines?

Mr. DORNAN of California. No; none whatsoever.

Mr. HYDE. What if Honduras says "Look, they are not a fighting force anymore, going to protect us and make the Sandinistas look inward, but now they are free to look outward and we do not want Nicaraguan refugees." Then what? Would we have new boatpeople maybe?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Of course, we are going to have feetpeople by the thousands.

But let me comment on how fast the debate is changing here and how resilient the arguments are on the other side defying all logic. Here is one of America's three major newspapers, the Los Angeles Times. The headline story is "Contras Seen as Ineffectual Force."

Mr. HYDE. Now wait a minute. Is that why the Sandinista government put the emergency decree in October 15 because the Contras are an ineffective force?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Marjorie Miller, the Times staff writer, tells us the Sandinistas grow stronger. Listen to how they adapt to this headline that only 5 weeks ago now looks ridiculous after the incursion began the night of March 22.

It says, "The Nicaraguan rebels backed by the United States are a rudimentary and ineffectual force, unable to mount a real military threat to their well-trained and well-equipped opponents, diplomats and military analysis here say," off the record.

These unnamed U.S. observers who are supposedly supporting the President say that "the Sandinistas, on the other hand, have become an experienced professional force." They describe the Contras as "an almost defeated army" and raise questions about how much pressure the rebels could put on the Sandinistas. They say, "The Sandinistas' confidence tends to reinforce this view." I would submit to my colleagues that after the events in Tripoli over the last few days, Mr. Ortega's confidence is not flying too high, particularly if the rumors we hear about Colonel Qadhafi turn out to be true later today.

Then it says in April, "when Congress was considering a request for $14 million in military aid to the Contras" last year, "the Sandinistas and their supporters were in a state of near panic." Then when we approved $27 million in nonlethal aid after Nicaraguan President Ortega traveled to the Soviet Union, to Moscow, the Soviet helicopters were cut loose. It says, "The public mood today is matter of fact and Ortega apparently is untroubled." I can tell you they are in their Communist bunker down there right now analyzing what we do carefully here; right, Mr. ROBINSON? And weighing the fate of Mr. Qadhafi. I beg you to get on the side of the real defense of human rights in our hemsiphere and support the Michael amendment.

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I am here because I fear also that we will lose to the Communists. But my fear is generated fom a different line of reasoning and from a disparate result on what we should do on this particular amendment.

The policy of this administration, and that of most of its predecessors, toward Central America has been based on the premise that communism is bad; that Soviet expansionism is particularly bad; and that Soviet expansionism onto our own continental soil—in whatever form—is a threat to our national security and totally unacceptable.

There are few, if any, in this room that would disagree with that premise. Where we do disagree is on the question of how we prevent such Soviet and Cuban incursions and what policies will ensure the stability and freedom of the hemisphere.

The administration believes that since the Sandinistas in Nicaragua are backed by the Soviet Union, they must be removed, and that the way to remove them is by supporting the Contra forces in order to force a change in government.

I, too, would rather see a democratic government in Nicaragua. I do not want to live with the threat of a Communist regime on our southern border. I continue to serve today as a Naval reservist because of my distrust of the Soviets. I was an officer in the 6th Fleet when Khrushchev beat his shoe on the podium at the United Nations, referring to my ship as a "coffin of steel." I was in the Lebanon landing in 1958, and later served on ships playing "navigational chicken" with Soviet ships in the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf.

I also vividly remember my exchange of letters with a Czech family that abruptly ended when the family lost its freedom and fell behind the iron curtain after World War II. And no one can read Gulag Archipelago or talk with Alexandr Solzhenitzyn and not feel deeply about the Soviet threat.

In short, I completely agree with the administration that we cannot ignore the Communist threat as we deal with the situation in our hemisphere. And, under certain circumstances where there is a direct threat to our national security, such as the location of missles, or in response to treaty obligations, I believe that military action might be justified. Years ago, I volunteered to serve during the Cuban missile crisis. More recently, I strongly backed the President's swift action in Grenada.

Yet military confrontation is frequently not the wisest course. We have plenty of examples in our history of what has happened when we have pursued military solutions that backfired and ultimately produced the very thing we sought to prevent.

I am reminded of Cuba and the Bay of Pigs. Or Vietnam. They are both examples of flawed thinking and policies that assumed the only way to prevent communism from gaining a toehold was through a military response.

In 1961, the Kennedy administration seemed to believe that all we had to provide was the military catalyst to oust Fidel Castro; that if we landed a group of Cuban exiles inside the country, the people would surge to greet them, tossing out the Communists. We assumed that every manifestation of Marxist doctrine resembled Stalinism, and was equally hated by the people.

Or so we thought. Instead, the invasion met with failure. While military planning mistakes were made which most likely prevented the success of the initial landing, there were other important factors that, in my mind, would have prevented any chance of success inside Cuba. The Cubans who led the invasion were primarily military men who had served under President Batista. They had few ties with the struggling democratic opposition. The mutual distrust between these two groups was so great that they were unable to join forces. There was no popular uprising. Nor was Castro scared into moderating his behavior. To the contrary, the Bay of Pigs solidified his dependency on the Soviet Union and his own hold on the people.

Vietnam was a country long subject to control by a colonial power. Not only were the people unable to develop their own government, they were prevented from providing for their own economic well-being. Then we launched a devastating war in an attempt to establish our system of government and to eradicate the Vietcong influence in the countryside.

What we overlooked was that the people in Vietnam were war-weary. They wanted peace. They wanted food for themselves and their children. They wanted only the opportunity to be left alone so they could provide for themselves. And it was Ho Chi Minh who appeared to offer the only things that really mattered to these peasants. This, combined with the mounting popular opposition to the war here at home, eventually led to the withdrawal of our troops and to the very thing we fought to prevent—a Communist regime in Vietnam.

The same thinking that prevailed in the Bay of Pigs and in Vietnam is dictating our response to Nicaragua today. And that is a tragic mistake. These historic parallels should make that quite clear. We have never won the hearts and minds of people through a purely military approach. And without the hearts and minds of the people, there can be no democracy.

The problems of Nicaragua are in many respects the problems of all of Central and South America. Poverty, illiteracy, disease, and economic oppression are undermining the fragile democracies in the region and fueling Communist-style revolutions throughout the hemisphere. If our policy toward the region does not address these conditions and provide support for our allies' attempts to eradicate these ills, then we will make very little headway at containing Nicaraguan-style revolutions.

One incident that forcefully brought that point home to me was a discussion I had with an Salvadoran peasant whom the Salvadoran Government introduced as an example of people fleeing rebel-controlled areas. When I asked the man what it was he really wanted, he replied, simply but eloquently: "All I want is a piece of ground to plant my corn."

What solutions to these problems do our Western European allies support? And how do our allies feel about our policy toward Nicaragua? After all, they are confronted daily with the threat of Communist proximity and must always be on the alert against Soviet expansionism. Yet their response to our policy has been nearly universal—they have opposed our aid to the Contras.

While we heard a lot about Daniel Ortega's trip to Moscow in April 1985, few people realize that his swing home through Western Europe provided him with $190 million in aid—only $12 million less than he was promised by the Eastern bloc nations. Additionally, the Europeans doubled their exports to Nicaragua from 1980 to 1984. As the Europeans stepped up their trade with the Sandinistas, Nicaraguan imports from the Eastern bloc countries amounted to only 26 percent in 1984.

As a personal aside, I recently received a note from 68 members of the Austrian Parliament representing all three politicial parties. They wrote to support my opposition to further aid to the Contras. The letter noted that 40 Austrian development assistants currently are working in Nicaragua, and that their "lives are menaced day after day by the indiscriminate acts of the 'Contras.'" Our Austrian counterparts urged us to withdraw aid to the Contras "in the spirit of all those humanitarian and democratic principles which unite the free nations on both sides of the Atlantic."

It is important to remember that this letter came from leaders of a country bordered on three sides by Communist governments. Surely we can learn from this attitude.

We aren't so far down the military path that we cannot reverse the policies of our Government in Nicaragua, although given the repressive actions by the Sandinistas recently, this may be difficult. What we certainly should be doing is pursuing more appropriate and effective policies in all Central American countries, and no repeating our mistakes.

My deep concern is that the administration has become so obsessed with military solutions that it is turning its back on the needs of our friends in Central America. The $100 million requested by the administration could make a real difference in improving conditions in Honduras, El Salvador, and Costa Rica—countries whose fragile democracies need our support. This is especially true if we learn from the Cubans, who outmaneuvered us very successfully in the early days after Somoza by providing Nicaragua with much-needed human resources—technical assistants in crucial areas such as agriculture, health and education.

We, too, could be providing that kind of valued assistance. We have many Americans—especially Hispanic Americans—who understand the culture, the people and the problems of Nicaragua and would be willing to help that country. They could do so if we had a program that would utilize their abilities on a long-term basis.

A good example of this kind of need—and the desire for our presence—was relayed to me by a Vermont veterinarian who traveled to rural Nicaragua. The Vermonter had asked a Nicaraguan colleague why there were Cuban vets in the area. He was told that the people would much prefer to have American vets, but that their animals were dying from disease, and the Cubans were the only ones offering help. The Vermonter was, in fact, the first American veterinarian the man had ever seen.

We must not underestimate the power of our presence in such underdeveloped countries. If we change our policy to address the most important needs of the people—and in a visible and human way—we can't help but lessen Nicaraguan dependency upon the Eastern bloc. Moreover, Ortega is finding the Eastern bloc increasingly reluctant to provide much-needed developmental assistance. The Soviet Union is facing its own extreme economic problems, and clearly neither it nor its allies are anxious to take on another drain upon its economy similar to that of Cuba.

A successful policy in Central America will take a firm commitment on our part, combined with a sensitivity to the unique problems of our southern neighbors. Through such a policy, we can and must show that democracy offers a brighter future for the people of Central America than does Marxism-Leninism. Unfortunately, we have ignored many of the positive suggestions for development contained in the Kissinger Commission report that would do just that.

I hate the idea of losing to communism. And this time, within our own hemisphere, winning is especially important. I have no doubt that we could successfully overthrow the Sandinistas if we threw ourselves into a total military effort. But it we did, we would find ourselves in a position of occupation that would quickly become untenable for us and unacceptable to our allies. I also am convinced that unless we adopt the policy outlined above, the cost will be painfully high. If we remain preoccupied with the Sandinistas, we will find out democratic friends in the region falling around us, succumbing to right- or left-wing dictorships or other forces of instability.

The stakes are now very high. And we can no longer afford to fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] has expired.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minutes to the gentleman in the well.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, just let me say one more phrase. I am afraid that we will lose again. And when we turn around, those fragile democracies which, if we were supporting now will succeed, will disappear off into rightwing dictatorships, leftwing dictatorships, and we will be back worse than we were when we started—even if we do succeed on the policies of conquering Nicaragua.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I have two points I would like to make.

I wish the gentleman would talk to Mr. ASPIN, who just returned from Nicaragua, and he was in the company of a man named Bernard Aaronson, a very liberal Democrat. Ask him what he found about the support for the Sandinistas and the Contras within the country. Just ask him.

Second, if hunger is the problem there—and we should be taking care of that, not Communist subversion—why did President Carter halt our aid, the aid that I voted for and the gentleman voted for? Was he not concerned about subversion in El Salvador and the building of a Communist dictatorship?

How do you deal with that? If it was not good enough for Carter, why should it be good enough for the gentleman?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, let me say, first of all, I have talked to many people from Nicaragua and Americans who have been to Nicaragua.

Mr. HYDE. Talk to Mr. ASPIN.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I have talked to Mr. ASPIN. I talked more recently to someone I also have confidence in. As I said before, I talked to a Vermont veterinarian who was down there working in Nicaragua. That veterinarian told me in his discussion with people there he had asked, "Why do you have Cuban and Soviet advisers?" They said, "Because we do not have Americans here. We would prefer Americans. Why don't they come?"

Mr. HYDE. They refused to take the Peace Corps. We asked to submit the Peace Corps. They wanted Cuba, not the Peace Corps. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. JEFFORDS. That may have been the decision of the Sandinistas, certainly not of the Nicaraguan people. I do not agree with the Sandinistas. Many Vermonters have been to Nicaragua and have worked with the Nicaraguan people.

I would add that when I was in El Salvador, I interviewed a farming family that fled from the guerrillas there. As I mentioned above I asked them what they wanted. Their response has stuck in my mind. I asked them "What are you looking for? Why did you leave?" They said all they want is a piece of ground to put their corn in.

That is the basic issue we are dealing with here, the needs of poor people to have a better life. We are not dealing in the countryside with Communist philosophy versus the democratic philosophy. We are dealing with who is going to help the people, and will their next day be better. If we don't offer them the better answer they will support those who do.

Mr. HYDE. When has communism ever given anybody anything but misery and hell on Earth?

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the Chair how much time each side has? According to my record, we have 34 minutes left on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The minority side has 34 minutes remaining and 31½ minutes remains on the majority side.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS].

Mr. BILIRAKIS. First, Mr. Chairman, I, too, wish to express disappointment with those of my colleagues who are engaging in parliamentary maneuvers here today. The inclusion of the Contra aid package in this supplemental appropriations bill is merely a tit-for-tat demand on the part of the majority leadership.

The leadership is saying: If you want your Contra aid package, we get our spending bills.

Mr. Chairman, in a time when we face several critical issues of foreign and domestic significance, this linkage in defiance of budgetary limits is unconscionable.

These issues deserve to be considered separately, and on their individual merits: To combine them is irresponsible and dangerous.

I regret that we are forced to consider legislation that is a Pandora's box and not an objective analysis of the Nation's priorities. The Nation deserves better than that.

As for the issue of aid to the Contra freedom fighters in Nicaragua, you know, we here in Congress must heed the words of one of history's great philosophers. It was Hegel who pointed out that—

> What experience and history teach us is this: That people and governments have never learned anything from history.

Today, we will have a second chance to prove Hegel wrong. We must not waste that chance. And what should we have learned?

We should have learned that relying on the Sandinista government in Managua to negotiate freely and openly without pressure is a waste of time. We have fresh evidence of that, don't we?

On March 20, this House voted down the President's aid request for the Contras. Did this inspire the Sandinistas to moderate their actions? No, it did not. What they did was initiate the largest cross-border incident ever with their neighbor, Honduras.

And this incident was roundly commemned by Members of this body, from the Speaker of the House and the majority whip right on down.

The Sandinistas followed that by scuttling the Contadora talks. This has been laid at their feet, not only by us, but by virtually all parties involved.

Diplomacy alone has failed again and again to move the Sandinistas away from their oppressive ways and toward a pluralistic form of government.

Special Envoy Philip Habib's mission to Latin America was the 50th U.S. diplomatic mission in 3 years seeking a negotiated settlement. He is the third special Presidential envoy, and we are no closer to a negotiated settlement today than we were all those years and lives ago.

Not one Communist dictatorship on Earth—ever—has voluntarily become a democracy or even moved in that direction. We cannot afford to abandon Central America to the Sandinistas, who have admitted they are conducting a revolution without borders. The freedom fighters are fighting to take their country back from a Soviet-Cuban-PLO-Libyan sponsored minority who betrayed their country's revolution and stole the only election they have agreed to hold. We cannot abandon these valiant freedom fighters either.

Today, let all of us prove Hegel wrong at last—for the sake of peace. Let's send the Contras the aid they so desperately need in their struggle to be free. Thank you.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I think we are all still considering the most recent incident of the so-called Sandinistas moving over into Honduras to enter the Contra camps.

Be advised that the Honduran Government never admitted or never would lay claim to the fact that the Contras were located in Honduras. In fact, about the time of these dynamic events, the President of Honduras, I believe, went on vacation.

We look back in history and we look at Cuba, and really we ask now, "Who is responsible for Fidel Castro being in Cuba? Who is ultimately responsible for the Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran?" We supported Somoza, and the people of Nicaragua could not stand Somoza, a ruthless dictator, and it was a very popular revolution to rid themselves of the most ruthless dictator in Central America.

But now I want to focus on another particular area. In 1983, Federal agents sized over 400 pounds of cocaine at San Francisco. As a result of this bust, the biggest ever in west coast history, two Nicaraguan nationals were convicted and sent to prison. These Nicaraguans have stated this drug deal and other deals were made to raise money for the Contras.

In addition, during the bust, $36,000 was seized by these Federal agents. However, this money was returned to these Nicaraguans when it was revealed that the money was not "drug money," and then a letter was shown to the Federal agents by the Nicaraguans, a letter from Contra leaders stating that the cash was really "political money for the reinstatement of democracy in Nicaragua."

In addition to this Contra connection in drug trafficking, sealed documents on this incident obtained by the San Francisco Examiner pointed to alleged cognizance of the CIA into this matter.

On April 12, 1986, an edition of the Washington Post reported that Federal investigators directed from Miami are examining allegations that Nicaraguan Contras and some private American backers have engaged in gunrunning, drug trafficking, and violations of the Neutrality Act.

These allegations, along with the serious allegations made in the San Francisco case, should start making us wonder who these Contras really are. Are these freedom fighters who are attempting to stop communism in Central America when the Honduran Government denies the existence of these Contras camps across the border?

Are we now moving forward to an area that is sacred in the American Constitution, one of self-determination?

We may not like what government is emanating from Nicaragua, but our Constitution affords America the most sacred right, one of self-determination, and we cannot project something different and continue to meddle in the internal affairs of these countries. Nicaragua has to do something with Mr. Ortega, that is true; but America cannot go in and fight everybody's battles. Let us get the Organization of American States and let the Contadora peace process work and give it an opportunity to work. These are either gunrunners, drug traffickers, or freedom fighters. People are going to have to make up their minds here in the House.

Mr. Chairman, once again we are considering whether or not to fund the Contras in Nicaragua. Since my time is limited, I want to ask my colleagues, before making their final decision on this vote, to consider just who the Contras are, and—more importantly—what they have been doing in recent years.

We have all heard about the human rights abuses, the fact that despite being termed "freedom fighters" the leadership of the Contras is not democratically elected—in fact, a large number of the Contra leaders are former officers in Somoza's dreaded National Guard—and it is obvious that the Contras have not won the hearts of the Nicaraguan people.

Aside from these very disturbing facts, I want to focus on allegations that the Contras have been involved in drug trafficking in the United States to raise money for their war. One incident is particularly disturbing.

In 1983, Federal agents seized 430 pounds of cocaine at a San Francisco seaport. As a result of this drug bust—the biggest ever in west coast history—two Nicaraguan nationals were convicted and sent to prison. These Nicaraguans have stated that this drug deal and other deals were made to raise money for the Contras. In addition, during the bust, $36,020 was seized by Federal agents. However, this money was returned to the Nicaraguans when it was revealed that the money was not drug money, and a letter was shown to Federal agents by the Nicaraguans—a letter from Contra leaders stating that the cash was really political money for the "reinstatement of democracy in Nicaragua." In addition to the Contra connection to drug trafficking, sealed documents on this incident—obtained by the San Francisco Examiner—point to alleged CIA involvement in this, and other drug deals to raise money for the Contras.

Allegations of Contra involvement in drug trafficking and possible CIA complicity in such nefarious action is cause for great concern. Before we send millions of U.S. dollars to the Contras, the American people should know, for certain, just what type of movement we are supporting. Anyone who would bring 430 pounds of cocaine into this country is a dangerous criminal and a threat to our society. No cause—no matter how just—warrants the poisoning of our youth with dangerous narcotic drugs. Before we cast our vote to aid the Contras, a full congressional investigation should be conducted to examine the allegations that have been made about Contra drug dealing in this country and possible CIA complicity in these dealings. We have a right to know.

I, along with my esteemed colleague from California, Congresswoman BARBARA BOXER, have written to the House Judiciary Committee requesting that these allegations be fully investigated. And the allegations are not limited to the San Francisco incident I alluded to earlier.

The April 12, 1986 edition of the Washington Post reported that Federal investigators, directed from Miami, are examining allegations that Nicaraguan Contras and some private American backers have engaged in gunrunning, drug trafficking, and violations of the Neutrality Act. These allegations, along with the serious allegations made in the San Francisco case, raise legitimate questions about what the Contra leadership has been doing to fund and carry on its war against the Nicaraguan people.

I once again point to the fact that this "leadership" is not democratically elected and they include ex-Somozistas. While the incident I have mentioned involve allegations that have not yet been proven to be fact, these allegations of Contra involvement in drug trafficking are serious enough to warrant a thorough re-thinking of whether or not to aid the Contra effort.

I urge my colleagues to consider this information and think twice before voting or whether or not to fund the Contra war.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. REGULA].

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, we are facing once again another crucial vote which will shape future United States policy toward Nicaragua. The ramifications of this vote will be felt in all of Latin America for the rest of this century.

We in Congress have been studying and debating this issue with each other, with the administration and with our Latin allies for several years. Our continued debate of this issue is testimony to its importance. I believe we have all come to the conclusion that the Sandinistas are not the Social Democrats they promised to be. They are in fact dangerous to the peace and solidarity of our hemisphere. The fledgling democracies of Central and South America are put at risk. We must remember the Sandinista statement: "Ours is a revolution without borders."

We as a body, our constituents and our Latin American allies have not as yet reached a consensus on what the proper U.S. response will be. The lack of a consensus is what makes this issue so difficult for us.

I propose to approach this matter from a different perspective. First we must make a judgment if this is a U.S. problem alone or a hemispheric problem. Clearly we have come to the conclusion that the presence of the Sandinistas and their Marxist philosophy affect the entire hemisphere. Why then do we not have a consensus within Latin America as to how to respond to the presence of the Sandinista regime?

I believe the answer to that is that we have not worked hard enough with our allies in the region to form a consensus. Having just visited with leaders of three Latin American countries—Brazil, Argentina, and Venezuela—I know that those leaders have no illusions as to the character of the Sandinistas. There is unanimity of opinion that the Sandinistas have perverted the promises of the revolution.

However, my questions to these leaders as to what our policy should be were met with ambiguity. If they are truly opposed to U.S. policy, then they must take on the responsibility for solving this problem. Their efforts with Contadora have truly been beneficial, even if a treaty is never signed. They now better understand the character of the Sandinistas and have come to the realization that negotiations are not going to work unless all are dedicated to them—a dedication that the Sandinistas lack.

There is a growing consensus in the hemisphere that the problem is great and the moment is historic. I believe that during the delay as provided in both the Michel and McCurdy proposals, the Organization of American States should be utilized to its full capacity.

The OAS if the oldest regional organization in the world. It was created for conflicts such as this. It has over the years been a forum for consensus-building and conflict resolution, both of which are needed now.

In 1978, Venezuela invoked article 59 of the OAS Charter to call for a Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs to respond to events in Central America, in particular Nicaragua. This meeting is still officially open, although inactive. It is the forum that should be used to make our case against the Sandinistas and to build a consensus with our Latin American allies.

This option clearly would share the Nicaraguan problem with the Latin American leadership, while demonstrating our commitment to negotiations. In the meantime, we need to continue providing the Contras with a defensive capability.

The Sandinistas are dragging their feet in negotiations because they believe they can militarily beat the Contras. If any nation is seeking a purely military solution—it is the Sandinistas. They hope to destroy the Contras and therefore make the issue of U.S. aid to them irrelevant.

The Contras are Nicaraguans. The initial release of $30 million must be made while other diplomatic options are pursued.

And finally, the Contadora countries and the United States must give serious consideration to the Organization of American States. It is the best way to build a consensus, and perhaps even to resolve the conflicts that are paralyzing Central America.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, the President is asking us for $100 million in aid to the Contras. Before we vote on this request, I think it is important for us to ask the same questions that we would ask about any other request for $100 million: What is our policy that we are seeking to support with that $100 million? Is it working? How much does it cost? How much will it cost?

Those are legitimate questions, the same kinds of questions we would ask if this were a program in education or in housing, or whatever. We have a responsibility to ask questions whether or not these funds are going to a policy that is working.

With regards to the policy question, I think the American people are very confused about what exactly our policy is in Central America today. Is it to overthrow the government? Is it to negotiate with the Government of Nicaragua? Is it to interdict arms shipments from Nicaragua to other countries? Let us, for the moment, agree that there is at least some consensus that we wish to encourage changes with regard to the Nicaraguan Government. Is this policy working to accomplish that goal?

Clearly, the answer is no. After 5 years of fighting, the Contras still have no perceptible popular support. They have a great deal of trouble recruiting additional new members. Most military and intelligence experts agree that $100 million is not going to change the Contras into a serious military and political threat to the Sandinistas.

So aid to the Contras, at least to this point, simply has not worked.

So what are we asked to do? We are asked to throw more money at the problem. That is a common response we have to other programs. But we are getting the same thing being asked here: Let's put more money into a program that is not working.

And the problem is that it results in what generally happens in other similar programs. It results in sloppiness and fiscal irresponsibility. We to this date do not know how $7 million was handled of the $27 million we provided in humanitarian aid. We have asked the GAO to look at it. They cannot tell us where it went.

We have now received from the State Department, as a result of a motion of inquiry, all of the documents they have. We have looked at it. The staff of the Foreign Affairs Committee has looked at it. They have been very cooperative. But the problem is, based on the documents they have we do not know where that money went, except that it went into a Miami bank account, and from there we do not know.

Surely, regardless of the position you have with regard to support for or against aid to the Contras, we have a responsibility to the taxpayers to be able to determine where those funds went.

In short, the policy makes no sense. Our allies and friends have told us that it makes no sense. Our allies and friends have told us that is the case. It is not a policy that is bringing us closer to achieving the goals that we seek to achieve.

The Hamilton substitute tries to offer a positive formula to help us break out of the bonds that we now have. Right now, the only thing that is resulting from this policy is the killing of people. And when push comes to shove, with regard to the people of Central America, they are being asked to pay the highest price of all. This is not the kind of policy we should be supporting, because the end result will be a waste of time, a waste of money and a waste of lives. The time has come to change that kind of policy.

I urge an "aye" vote on the Hamilton substitute.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thought maybe I might take a few minutes here to deal with some of the questions that have been raised and some of the points that have been raised by the opposition, because it seems to me that sometimes this debate gets tangled up in a lot of things that prove to be confusing within that debate.

For example, we had the gentleman from Ohio out here a few minutes ago bringing up the drug dealing of the Contras again. A little while ago in the debate it was shown that the person who raised that charge was a Colombian who later said that he lied with regard to that drug-dealing charge. And yet time and time again the people have come to the floor in opposition and raised this phony issue out on the floor. It seems to me that once you put it to bed, it ought to be left there, and we ought to get away from arguments that have proven to be patently false.

We also had a discussion out here a little while ago about this question of: How are we spending the taxpayer money?

And I raised the issue with one of the Members of the other side of: How was he going to vote when it comes to the issue that is also contained in this bill of money to go to Ireland? We are concerned about people in this country. How are we going to vote when it comes to the question of excising from this bill the money that is now supposed to go to Ireland? And I could not get an answer from him. It is always amazing, to me, what we find when we raised those kinds of questions.

If you are dealing with anti-Communists, if you are dealing with an anti-Communist kind of issue, then there is, all of a sudden, questions about sending money overseas. However, if there is no real threat to freedom, then we are perfectly willing to send money everywhere and anywhere. So it will be interesting to see the dichotomy that results here between people who have come to the floor and talked about our farmers and talked about housing and talked about all of these things, with regard to spending foreign-aid money, how they will vote when the issue is, do we send $50 million to Ireland, and whether or not their rhetoric on $100 million to fight communism in Central America is real.

The question was raised by the gentleman from Indiana a little while ago: What happens if military aid fails?

That is indeed a very important question. It seems to me there is an answer, and that is: If military aid fails, at the very least we will have at that point kept the Nicaraguan Communists from coalescing their power there. As long as they are faced with some kind of internal pressure, they are not going to coalesce their power, and that that is indeed as important a goal for our policy in Central America. On the other hand, the question needs to be raised about the policy of capitulation. What happens if the leftist capitulation policy fails? Well, it seems to me that there are a couple of things that happen at that point. If in fact they have established Soviet bases in their country, which they are in the process of doing, it seems to me then the United States might have to make the choice of a deeper military involvement by our own country. That is the real danger. The real danger of Americans having to fight in Central America is: if the policy of capitulation allows the Sandinistas to coalesce their power there in a way that it becomes a pro-Soviet base similar to Cuba, then we have got a problem.

Right now all of the people in this Congress say, "Well, there is nothing we can do about Cuba." Why? Well, because we have allowed Cuba to coalesce its power. It would be foolhardy at the present time to send a force against Cuba. So we simply have to accept that nation, which is subverting democracy and freedom all over the world, not just in Central America. We accept it today. And that is wrong. That is wrong, but it was brought on by a leftist policy of capitulation before. That is what we are proceeding toward again.

And if the capitulation policy fails, then what about those millions of refugees? What are we going to do about them, because we are certainly going to be faced with them. If we are not faced with them, our allies in Honduras and Costa Rica and some of those nations that are struggling to survive, anyhow, are going to be faced with them. A capitulation policy that fails is very dangerous to struggling democracies in Central America. We have had the argument out here on the floor that the Contras are not credible. If the Contras are not credible, given the definition of what credibility is, I would submit, then, that the Afghan rebels are not credible either. I wonder whether or not we are willing to say that we are going to withdraw our aid based upon the definitions here of those people who are struggling to fight against Soviet aggression in their own country. That seems to me to be the kinds of choices that we are being asked to make here. If you accept the definition of credibility that has been put on the Contras, then I would submit that we are probably not going to be able to aid freedom fighters anywhere, and maybe that is what the left of this country really wants—no help for freedom fighters anywhere. It is not what I think most of the American people want.

We have also had the argument here that we cannot go along with the President's policy anymore because the policy has not worked. Good heavens, I say to my friends, we have not allowed it to work. The Contras cannot be blistered on the House floor for having had an ineffective military; they have not gotten any military help for 18 months.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] has expired.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, we have had a policy that this Congress has prevented from working, and so the Contras are in fact the victims of what this House of Representatives has decided time and time again to do to them instead of doing something for them, and no amount of evidence seems to be available that would convince the left in this country that they have been wrong. It does not convince them when Ortega goes to Moscow, it does not convince them when the Nicaraguan Communists invade their neighbors, nothing convinces them. They allow the policy not to work.

The bottom line is, I think, that the policy we are being asked to accept here on the House floor here today by the left wing in this country is the policy of trusting the Sandinista Communists. It is a blame-America-first policy of the first order. It seems to me it is not really a policy; it is a fantasyland scenario, and it has nothing to do with the real world.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to stick with the real world, vote for the Michel amendment, and let us have a policy that is real in Central America.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, here we go again. We are being asked once again to put money and people's lives—this time it is Nicaraguans' lives—into an endless war.

Last week Mr. Elliott Abrams spoke before the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, and he told us in his testimony that, in his judgment, the Nicaraguan Government's military forces could give the Mexican military a good match. Now, the Nicaraguans have under 3 million people, and the Mexicans have 20 times that number of people.

So I asked the question: "How are those, at most, 20,000 Contras going to stand up against the Nicaraguan military?"

His answer was that there would be such disaffection among the Nicaraguan people that they will eventually turn the government out.

The subcommittee then had three witnesses, two of whom oppose aid to the Contras and one of whom supports it. I asked them, "How much do you think it would take to give the Contras a fighting chance to defeat the Nicaraguan military?"

And they each said, "At least $500 million, and that is assuming that the people of Nicaragua were to rise up in support of the Contras." But Mr. Chairman, there is no indication at all that the Contras, because of their policies of mayhem and torture and murder and rape and pillage, have any chance at all of picking up the support of the Nicaraguan people.

But here we are being told by the President that if only we give them $100 million, something significant is going to happen. Nothing is going to happen, except that the administration will come back for at least $400 million more and then maybe ask for some direct American military support through advisers and trainers and finally combat troops to try to bail out the Contras. The American people do not want that.

There was some mention here earlier that the American people support the President. Every poll that has been taken, some as recently as this past week, indicates that the American people overwhelmingly oppose the President's policy of support for the Contras.

By a margin of 62 to 25 percent, respondents to the CBS/NYT poll said they oppose giving "military and other aid to the Contras trying to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. "A year ago, 53 percent of those responding to a similar CBS/NYT poll opposed helping "the people trying to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua" while 32 percent favored such help.

The depth of public opposition to aiding the Contras is underscored by the fact that 59 percent of those polled believe the Nicaraguan Government will provide bases for the Soviet Union while 56 percent agreed that Nicaragua constitutes a threat to the security of other Central American countries. Nonetheless, 62 percent oppose aid to the Contras.

The degree of public opposition can also be seen in the fact that aiding the Contras is opposed by a clear majority of Republicans (51 percent to 36 percent opposed) as well as Democrats (74 percent to 16 percent) and Independents (60 percent to 26 percent), and by overwhelming majorities from every section of the country: the Northeast (61 percent to 27 percent opposed), the Midwest (67 percent to 42 percent), the South (59 percent to 27 percent), and the West (64 percent to 24 percent).

Other recent polls also reflect an increase in the level of public opposition to aiding the Contras. For example, a Gallup poll taken last month before House rejection of the President's request for $100 million in Contra aid showed 52 percent opposed and 35 percent in favor.

Following House rejection of the Reagan request, an ABC/Washington Post poll found 60 percent approving the House action and 34 percent disapproving. A new Harris poll taken over last weekend shows a similar division with 62 percent opposing aid to the Contras and 33 percent in favor.

Mr. Chairman, for 5 years we have debated this war and for 5 years it has been our President's leading obsession. What have we got to show for this treasure and these efforts? The Contras have killed thousands of Nicaraguans, including many innocent civilians, and they control not an inch of territory.

I got a letter recently which brings home the destructiveness and futility of this war. It was from a group of citizens in Switzerland. They were writing, in sadness and in anger, to protest the killing of Maurice Demierre in Nicaragua on February 16, 1986. Mr. Demierre was a Swiss citizen, an agricultural specialist. He worked with a Christian group called Brothers Without Borders, which assists in development projects in various areas in the Third World.

Mr. Demierre had worked for the last 4 years on farm projects in a district of Nicaragua close to the Honduran border. He was well liked and respected in the area, and his wife worked with him there. On February 16, he was riding with a group of Nicaraguan civilians in a jeep which hit a mine placed by the Contras. The mine disabled the jeep, and Mr. Demierre and four Nicaraguan women were then killed by Contras who raked the area with automatic weapons fire. Our tax dollars were helping to keep his killers in the field.

Many newspapers in Europe prominently carried the story and editorialized against the policy that resulted in his death. It is events like this which explain why the United States stands almost completely isolated in the entire world on the issue of Nicaragua. The policy is not a way to preserve U.S. influence or credibility in the world; it is a sure formula for uniting other nations against us.

The Hamilton amendment will at long last turn our policy in a constructive direction. I urge its adoption today.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, in order to keep the record straight, we have a list of pithy sayings made by majority Members, that is being kept on our leadership desk on this side so we can track the record of the last several years' debate.

Here is a statement by my good friend and distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], made on April 23 of last year, almost a year ago. Mr. WEISS said, "If you are a citizen of El Salvador, you have nowhere near the capacity to openly criticize your government as you do if you are a citizen of Nicaragua."

Well, that certainly is not true now, not when there are 11,000 people in political prisons in Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, the Chinese proverb, going back a few thousand years, that one picture is worth a thousand words is certainly true, and this picture should be shown every hour on the hour. Here is the suspended priest, Miguel D'Escoto, holding up the Marxist fist of death, the Communist fist. And it is a disgrace for even a suspended priest to call his cardinal a CIA agent and a traitor, marking him for assassination, as D'Escoto has.

Here is Danny Ortega with his one campaign ribbon. That is for shooting two milk truck delivery men and crippling them. They are both still in wheelchairs in Nicaragua, unable even to become a land person and escape on foot. That is his only combat mission. You remember when Ortega robbed the bank, got caught and was sent to prison? It was Eden Pastora who sprung him from prison. Eden Pastora is now back in the hills. He wrote me a great letter last week begging some of the Democrats to wake up.

And here is Qadhafi. Let me tell you what his combat ribbons are for. This one here is for little Natasha Simpson dying in her father's arms in the airport in Rome. This ribbon here is for Kenneth Ford. That is a brand new one. It is for killing our Army sergeant in that disco in Berlin.

Here is a ribbon for little Demetra Klug, who was blown out of an airplane with three other Americans, one of them pregnant.

Here is a ribbon where the colors are indistinct because it is for the one that caused the garbage trucks to be parked around Capitol Hill here at night. He never got to pull off that bombing here at the Capitol.

And here is one for sending $400 million to Nicaragua. That is four times what we are debating. This is just one radical leftist. That $400 million, of course, helped to murder Greg Webber, Tom Handwork, Bobby Dickson, and Patrick Kwiatkowski, four young marines, in San Salvador at Chilli's Cafe.

On and on it goes, his five rows—six across—of ribbons earned for engaging in death and mayhem and terrorism against this country. Qadhafi; of course, holds up the Marxist salute, as does Danny O.—that is the affectionate name for Ortega used by an Irish-American Congressman from New England. I am sorry, fellows, he is not Irish. Danny Ortega is a killer, a Communist cut out of the mold of Qadhafi.

To see this suspended priest D'Escoto, whose doctors took him off his diet when he gained 3 pounds last July—remember, he went on a diet which some of the leftist clergy here in America joined him in—well, he never got too far because he started gaining weight. It is called a lemonade diet. And that is a true story.

This is a disgraceful trio here, and the only thing wrong with this picture is that D'Escoto—he was known as Mike Brockman when he went to school in Hollywood—should have been excommunicated, not just suspended, for bringing a threat of assassination against his cardinal and the other bishops in Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY].

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hamilton-Richardson proposal to bar any kind of aid to the Contras until September 1, 1986.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a consistent opponent of aid to the Contras and a hopeful Member of the Congress to think that we could find a peaceful solution to this problem in Central America. I have also been consistent in my support of the Contadora process. Yet every time I have talked about it, I felt that something was missing, and as this situation has become more serious and as I see us coming closer to a military solution and see us coming closer to going down a road that is going to be heartbreaking as well as expensive, I beg once more that my colleagues consider negotiation through the Hamilton-Richardson proposal.

The missing link in the Contadora process, I believe, has been us. I think so many of us look at the Contadora process, not realizing that we have to be a true partner in this process. Whenever we talk to the leaders of the Contadora countries, they look to us and say, "What can we do? You have already decided that it is going to be a military solution."

These are people who are very interested in their trade deficit, what they owe the United States, and they are very interested in their economic futures. They have no illusions about Ortega and Nicaragua, and they know that $100 million cannot overthrow Ortega and the Sandinistas. They know that if we have a military solution and we get involved in Nicaragua, the next thing will be that all those extreme elements in their countries will come forward. They are very familiar with not having democracy.

They know what it is like to live under a military rule. They know if we bring unrest to the Central American area, unrest will come to these countries, too.

So, I urge my colleagues to support the Hamilton-Richardson process, because for one more time we can try to be a partner with the Contadoras, insist that they not only express moral outrage, insist that they come up with some concrete solutions, that we will work with them, whether it be isolating Nicaragua, whether it be a peacekeeping force, but at least once more, Mr. Chairman, let us try the peaceful solution of negotiations, once more to say that we tried to do it without war.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Hamilton amendment, in opposition to the McCurdy amendment, in opposition to the Mrazek amendment, and for Senate Joint Resolution 283.

In our cloakroom on the Democratic side we have a handout, an overview of the Lou Harris poll. As I read this, a poll that consisted of surveying 1,254 Americans out of a population of 250 million, I was outraged to read the way the poll was prefaced to those being polled. Not once in the Lou Harris poll did they ask the person that they were asking to respond, "Are you for or against communism?"

Not once did they ask the individuals in the poll, "Did you know that the money that we are asking for has been appropriated for DOD use and it would not be used for farmers or other domestic programs?"

Not once did they ask the person being surveyed, "Do you want another Cuba in this hemisphere?"

Not once did they ask the person surveyed, "Did you know that Daniel Ortega has refused to participate in the Contadora process?"

Not once did they ask, "Did you know that Daniel Ortega promised free elections?"

"Did you know that he promised not to censor the press?"

"Did you know that he promised not to commit acts that were barbaric against his own citizens?"

Not once did they ask, "Do you know that the Contras are Nicaraguan citizens? They are not Libyans. They are not Communists. They are not Algerians."

The purpose of my brief remarks today is simply to say this poll is bogus. The American people elected Ronald Reagan to forge foreign policy. They did not elect Lou Harris. We now have 435 Secretaries of State in the House of Representatives and 435 Presidents, and fellows, you are making a mess out of foreign policy.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hamilton amendment. It truly is an alternative to the current policy of this administration, which is seeking to provide military aid, in the past has provided military aid, to the Contras in an effort to destabilize and overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

This policy has not worked. And the fact of the matter is that this policy will not work, even if $100 million is provided, and hundreds of millions of dollars are provided in the future, as the logic of this policy dictates.

More importantly, this policy will not allow a democracy to flower in Nicaragua. In fact, it will continue to be the pretext for stifling democracy in Nicaragua. It will continue to be the pretext for repression in Nicaragua.

I say to those who have risen time and again in support of the emerging democracies in Latin America, that the heads of states of many of those emerging democracies say that this administration's policy threatens those very democracies. An election does not make a strong democracy. An election starts a country down the road to a democracy.

As we know, the countries of Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvdor, Colombia, Venezuela, Brazil, and Argentina, are beset with a whole series of problems that must be resolved if the roots of democracy are to go anywhere below the surface; but those roots can only take hold with our help and encouragement.

But rather than make an example of the Latin American democracies, rather than show what happens when you move to a democracy, in terms of our friendship, and economic power, we have chosen to do something else. We have chosen to make ourselves the issue.

What we were told on our recent trip to Latin America by the heads of those democratic countries was that they felt that a continuation of our policy toward Nicaragua threatened them. Even though in many instances they were thousands of miles away, they were concerned that continued and increased American intervention in Nicaragua would threaten the foundations of their countries.

The question really is whether or not those who support administration policy have as much faith in the positive aspects of our democratic tradition that we bring to Latin America as they have faith in communism. The fact of the matter is that the tide is running against the Sandinistras. The tide is running against Nicaragua. The tide in Latin America and South America today is for democracy.

The question will be whether or not the United States of America puts its energies into fostering those democracies, fostering those economies, so that we can establish the strength of those democracies and never again go back to dictators of the right or the left.

Unfortunately, we are now seeking to squander a valuable $100 million in fostering repression in the state of Nicaragua.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes and 45 seconds to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I was reading some of your thoughts. I did not identify the bottom row of ribbons on Mu'ammar's chest. The first one is for the rifle slaughter of the British constable, Yvonne Fletcher, on the streets of London. Shot in the stomach, she died a very painful death.

This one was a public relations award for praising the Soviet fighter pilot who killed Larry McDonald, one of our great colleagues of 10 years' standing, and 267 other grandparents, men, women, children, and infants.

This ribbon was for supplying the wherewithal, the financial sustenance, $400 million, to murder our naval attache, Lt. Com. Al Schauffelburger, as he sat in his car in San Salvador.

This last one is particularly odious. It is another public relations award, earned by Qadhafi and his friends at Radio Vinceramos in Nicaragua, for broadcasting from El Salvador that two Americans who had been killed in the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger were war criminals.

That is just a little reminder done in a spirit of good-naturedness, that, let us face it, those awards were not won in combat. They are for the kind of ugly rhetoric, the praising of these heinous deeds for which Qadhafi has become justifiably infamous. And it is that connection between the terrorist training camps and Nicaragua that we have carefully tried to lay out before you today. Well, let me close with the words from one of the distinguished prelates of my faith, and the Speaker's faith, in this hemisphere, Cardinal Migel Obando y Bravo. While our delegation of nine was visiting the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] asked the question, "Who is here in this country, assisting the Sandinistas given that Americans are trying to help the freedom fighters?"

I close with this quote of the boss of Mike Brockman (Miguel O'Escoto), Obando y Bravo, who I have said in this well is the bravest man in this hemisphere, a man marked for execution by the Communist Sandinistas, turned to our group of nine Congressmen and said, "Well, you know who is here? The Tupamaros, the Montoneros, the ETA, the radical Marxist IRA terrorists, the Bulgarians, all the other East German countries, the Libyans," and he closed I think on the PLO.

Our translator said, "The PLO, Bulgarians and all the rest"—and I stopped and said, "Please, let us get the whole litany translated," and we went through them all again with this great prince of the Catholic Church, Cardinal Obando y Bravo.

So that is why I think it is tragic that the religious left in this country has intimidated so many Members of our House, when only 38 percent of our country even knows what side any of us are on in this debate, when what we are supposed to do here is win our profile in courage and lead.

Mr. Chairman, in truth, it is a human rights issue concerning 11,000 political prisoners, that we are voting on today.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HERTEL].

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we are all opposed to the Sandinistas denying freedom to the people of Nicaragua. What we are talking about in this lengthy debate is what should our policy be.

I want to quote from the doctrine enunciated in November 1984 by our Secretary of Defense, Mr. Weinberger. I want to quote him specifically as to when military forces should be used.

Mr. Weinberger said:

If we do decide to commit forces to combat of overseas, we should have clearly defined political and military objectives and we should know precisely how our forces can accomplish those clearly defined objectives and we should have and send the forces needed to do just that.

Mr. Weinberger, our Secretary of Defense, also said in that speech:

Before the United States commits combat forces abroad, there must be some reasonable assurance that we will have the support of the American people and their elected Representatives in Congress.

So then just a few months ago, Mr. Weinberger came to spend a day before the House Armed Services Committee, of which I am a member. I asked him in regard to the administration's policy in Nicaragua how much money was he going to ask for in the future, how long would it take? I asked if American trainers would be used. I asked him about the possibility of American forces involvement.

Mr. Weinberger's answer to me was:

I don't have my crystal ball with me, Mr. Hertel, and I can't tell you all the answers to all of those questions.

Let me cite further Mr. Weinberger's own statement of when Armed Forces should be used:

The point we must keep uppermost in our minds if we ever decide to commit forces to combat, we must support those forces to the fullest to show our national will for so long as it takes to win. We must have in mind objectives that are clearly defined and understood and supported by the widest possible number of our citizens.

Let me tell the Members of the House that before I asked the questions about specifics, I cited Mr. Weinberger's own doctrine to him and again when I asked how much money, how long, and what about American trainers and American forces, he could not give me an answer to those questions, just as no one else in the administration has given us an answer to those questions; but clearly when he points out that we need the long-lasting support of the Congress and the American people, we see that test has not already been met in the Senate and by a very narrow margin his policy with an amendment was approved, because you see, Mr. Weinberger is ignoring and going against his own doctrine.

He quoted in that same November 1984, speech the historian, the military historian Klauswitz. He quoted him as saying:

No one in his senses ought to do so without first being clear in his mind what he intends to achieve by that war and how he intends to conduct it.

Clearly, Mr. Weinberger has not met the test of his own doctrine. His policy is ill-thought out. It is openended and that is why it is going to be defeated by the House. That is why the American people do oppose it.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN].

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hamilton amendment, but I would just like for a moment to say to my colleagues that I think there are good arguments and bad arguments to be against aid to the Contras. One of the bad arguments is that folks at home need money and it is a mistake to send money overseas. I happen to be one of those Members who believe that there are certain parts of this world that we should send perhaps defense aid and food aid overseas. I do not want to get to see us locked into a trap when we have future foreign aid measures before this House that will be brought up before us and say that we should not support this because we did not support aid to the Nicaraguan Contras.

The fact of the matter is there are reasons on the merits not to support aid to the Nicaraguan Contras. The issue is troubling. There are no clear cut answers.

We obviously do not want another Cuba in this hemisphere. But as my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HERTEL] said, we have to decide what our goals are in connection with this policy, and until we decide what those goals are, I do not want to commit the potentiality of U.S. troop loss of life and a major land war in Central America because we did not know what we were trying to accomplish.

Are we trying to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua? Are we trying to preserve internal freedoms in Nicaragua such as freedom of the press and democracy? Are we trying to stop interference of Nicaragua into other countries? Are we trying to get the Soviets and Cubans out? Are we trying to enhance Latin influence?

Each one of these things demands a different response, and demands a response targeted to what we are trying to achieve. Aiding the Contras may achieve some of these, but certainly not all of these, and it certainly will not achieve the overthrow of the government and it currently will not achieve the preservation of internal freedom.

It certainly will achieve a greater likelihood that the United States will involve troops in that region of the world.

We need to know what our goals are before we go ahead. In the words of H.L. Mencken, for every complicated problem there is a simple and a wrong solution. I fear that we are following that simple and wrong solution in this case, and I urge my colleagues to support the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to how many speakers the majority side has?

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, we have one remaining speaker for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest, then, after that, that we will reserve the balance of our time, and after the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH] has finished, we may go directly to the vote.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. MCHUGH. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, we are clearly facing once again a critical choice on our policy in Central America. This is not a choice between withdrawal and engagement; it is fundamentally a choice between alternative forms of engagement.

Both alternatives before us today recognize that we have legitimate interests in Central America, and that withdrawal and isolation do not constitute a viable policy. However, the two alternatives before us do indeed present us with different ways of actively pursuing our interests in that region.

One alternative is embodied in the President's current policy, a policy which is presented today by the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL]. That policy focuses on military force, and specifically on military aid to the Contras whose avowed purpose is the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government.

I realize that some proponents of this aid, and the President himself at times, suggest that the purpose of the aid is to promote negotiations. But this is not the stated goal of the Contras themselves, and many of the proponents have candidly admitted here today, as they have in the past, that the purpose of the aid and the purpose of the policy is the total elimination of the Sandinista government, the cancer, as they call it, in Central America.

If Members support the Michel proposal, make no mistake about it, it is that policy and that goal to which Members are committed, regardless of the circumstances and implications down the road.

The second alternative is presented to us once again by the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on the Middle East and Europe, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON]. This alternative does not embrace the Sandinista regime; it recognizes that we have legitimate concerns and differences with the direction the Sandinistas are taking. Indeed, it suggests and affirms that we will defend our interests with military force if necessary when we are threatened, and we will defend our friends if they are threatened.

This alternative does not disengage the United States from Central America But, rather, it proposes a more affirmative and I believe a more effective alternative for pursuing our interests in Central America. It proposes to work with our friends in the region, and specifically supports the Contadora effort, an effort which has been given lip service by the President but which, in truth, has never been given a real commitment. The Hamilton alternative proposes to reach out and help the people who are suffering in Central America, our neighbors, about whom we are truly concerned, by providing refugee assistance while the political process is given a fair and meaningful opportunity.

Will this alternative policy succeed? Is there any guarantee that it will be effective? No; no one can provide any guarantees here today. But what we do know is that the Hamilton alternative will enjoy much broader public support than the President's policy currently does.

We do know, moreover, that public support both here and in Central America is absolutely essential to an effective policy. Why is it that the people of our country in poll after poll do not support the President's current policy? Is it because they are opposed to military force under any circumstances? I think not. Recent days have shown that the American people will rally behind the President in the use of military force if they believe we have been threatened, as we have in the case of Libya and Qadhafi in particular. American citizens not only have been threatened but they have been killed, and there is sufficient evidence to tie Qadhafi to those killings. They will support military force by the President in such a case so long as they believe that the President has first tried other means of resolving the problem. As the President has said, he did try other means in dealing with Libya. He tried economic sanctions. He tried political persuasion. He tried an initial demonstration in the Gulf of Sidra that we were serious, even in the use of military force, and nothing worked.

When there is no other alternative and when we are in fact threatened, most Americans will support the ultimate use of force, as they have this week in Libya. But they are not convinced, in the case of Nicaragua and Central America, that the President has tried other means. And when they are not convinced, they will not support a policy of military intervention; and when they do not support the policy, it cannot be an effective policy.

So, if the President is sincere, as I believe he is, in attempting to protect our interests in Central America, he should look again at the means he is using because those means are not broadly supported, and therefore are not sustainable as effective policy.

I believe that the Hamilton alternative embodies a more effective, a more popular approach to the active pursuit of American interests in Central America. It proposes to meaningfully pursue negotiations, to try political dialogue, while at the same time affirming that we will defend our interests if they are threatened directly, and will defend our friends if they are threatened directly. The Hamilton alternative enunciates a principle and a policy which the American people can support, and indeed do support if all of the polls are any indication.

I, therefore, urge my colleagues, at this time of critical choice when perhaps we have the last opportunity before military escalation gets out of hand, to support the Hamilton approach as an alternative to the military approach embodied in the Michel proposal.

If we go down the road of military escalation which is embraced by the Michel proposal, there is no doubt that the Sandinistas will respond in kind. Advisers of the U.S. military will be in place under the Michel proposal. Inevitably the escalation will involve U.S. military advisers, even though I am sure the President does not intend to directly involve U.S. forces in the military engagements.

This may in fact be our last opportunity to turn back, or at least pause in the pursuit of military escalation as a U.S. policy in Central America. The Hamilton alternative affords us that opportunity to pause and try negotiations.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to make that choice, and to support the Hamilton alternative.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would inquire of the majority side if that was the last speaker for them?

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

NOT VOTING—6

Messrs. PERKINS, MICA, ASPIN, and WHITTEN changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. COLEMAN of Missouri, IRELAND, DORNAN of California, GREGG, KASICH, DAVIS, BROOKS, MOORE, and STRATTON changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So, the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair advises that under the rule the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 15 minutes and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] will be recognized for 15 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, is additional debate time still pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise that under the rule there is 30 minutes of additional debate time, allocated 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington, and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, it might be of interest to be informed as to why this action was taken. It may come as a shock to some of you to see the Republican leader and other Republicans vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Let me explain why we did it. When you have a rotten rule to play by, we are forced to be somewhat unconventional in our approach to the process. Our vote was the only way we had of telling the majority of the American public that we will not be a party to a procedure that debases the legislative process and demeans the ideals of comity and civility that lie at the heart of that process.

This procedure under which we are forced to debate is a variation of the old con game "heads I win, tails you lose." We refuse to play the roles assigned to us by the directors of this farce.

We have been forced to introduce a rule that will eventually give the House a real chance to debate and vote on this very important issue, standing alone without being married up to a proposition that it frankly, as I said weeks ago, is going nowhere.

But in order for this strategy to become successful, we need 218 votes for a discharge petition. Monday Mr. LOTT and I introduced a rule, House Resolution 419, which will make in order House Joint Resolution 283, introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY] last year, that has to do with funding the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

It would be our intention under that rule as so enunciated in the rule, to make in order three substantial amendments: Mr. MCCURDY himself would be permitted to introduce his own amendment to his previous resolution. Mr. BARNES and Mr. HAMILTON will be allowed to have their own amendment, and then it would be expected naturally that BOB MICHEL would have his own amendment that pretty closely tracks with the President's proposal here.

By the middle of next week, after the required 7 legislative days have expired, we will file a discharge petition and begin selecting Member's signatures on that discharge petition.

If we get the required number of signatures, it will then be our intention to call up this rule on May 12, the first date under the rules on which it would be eligible to be called up.

But even at that late date that appears to be now, when I see what will happen with the supplemental appropriation bill, we are going to be ahead of our time if we honor that kind of proposition. And in my judgment we ought to take that course.

In last month's debate, our distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. FASCELL, said this issue is not going to go away. The issue is will we have democracy in Nicaragua? That indeed is the issue, Mr. Chairman, as you reflect the great and glorious tradition of your party and having said so that day in debate on the floor of this House. Now for those of you in the majority leadership who thought you could ignore the flight of democracy from Nicaragua by turning this debate into one in which we have to choose between aid to the Contras and a supplemental appropriation bill loaded with goodies, I have to say again we just cannot play that game.

Frankly, it is just inconceivable that serious leaders would deal with a grave foreign policy issue in this way. So I do not know that there is any need for any further explanation. That was the reason for our doing what we did today, and we hope that there would be those reasonable rational people out there who likewise see it our way, that when the time comes for signing the discharge petition to give us a mechanism by which we could bring this up as a freestanding proposition and being fair about giving your side two substantial amendments to do anything you want to, I just happen to feel that my position is one that is shared by a majority of this House and given a clean shot at it, will win notwithstanding your two efforts to try and beat us down.

Just give us that chance.

And finally, my friends, I think the President deserves better treatment than what we would propose to be giving him here today by this sham charade.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I said this morning, there is no person I respect in this House more than the distinguished leader of the Republican Party, the gentleman from Illinois. I think that is an opinion that is very broadly shared on our side of the aisle from the Speaker to the newest Member of the Democratic Party. We have a deep division on this question, that has nothing to do with whether we are Democrats or Republicans. There are Democrats who are for Contra aid, as well as Republicans who are against it. There is no question of patriotism involved here. There is a deep question of what our country's policy should be for the future in Central America, and it is a long and very important decision that is being made today. What we are deciding goes beyond whether we will provide $100 million in 18 months. It goes many years ahead, for better or worse.

Today I heard my friend, the distinguished Republican leader, say something very surprising. He came to the floor and said it was because the American people do not understand this issue that the President and the administration have been unable to get even a bare majority of support from any region of the country for this proposal.

In fact, the American people disapprove the policy enunciated in the Michel amendment. While some would lay the blame for this on the public and what they believe to be its lack of understanding of the issue, I in fact think they understand it very well. By 2 to 1, 3 to 1, and 4 to 1, and even greater percentage in every region of this country and, in every poll or survey that has been taken, and however the question is stated, they have come back again and again saying that they do not want a war in Nicaragua, they do not want a proxy war, they do not want an American war.

That does not mean that they approve of what is going on in Nicaragua or that they want to see Soviet or other influence brought into this hemisphere in a way that endangers our liberty—I did the gentleman the courtesy of being attentive during his remarks, and I hope he will do the same courtesy for me.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I will in a moment.

We had an opportunity today to vote on a compromise. While the President's original proposal was given in an up or down, all or nothing way, it seems to be the determination of some here to have the House deny that same consideration to others. We think it would be in the American people's interest to have a decision about whether there should be some compromise, some intermediate position. That, however, is not going to be permitted by this tactic. Make no mistake about it, it is a tactic, one which the gentleman from Illinois himself confessed and stated he was unfortunately forced to make. Let us have no mistake either about the fact that frustration and difficulty here have nothing to do with one procedure or another. They arise from the fact that the American people cannot and will not be brought along to a policy of headlong, reckless intervention in Latin America that could eventually bring us to the brink of a war they do not want and that they reject. That is the issue and the problem. The rest of it is just debate.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois briefly.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is so sure that the American public is so overwhelmingly behind his position, why the reluctance to give us a free-standing vote on this important issue?

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman is so convinced of his own position why not permit Mr. MCCURDY to offer his amendment and let us have a vote on that?

Mr. HYDE. We will, we will.

Mr. FOLEY. We can do that today. We can do it right now. In fact, we would have done so.

Let us not have a misunderstanding over what the issue is.

With the best effort and with sincere commitment, the President and the administration have tried to persuade the American people of this policy. Because they have not been able to do that, I think that as much as anything else, this is an effort to have a little more time for persuasion. There should be no question about fairness.

The House of Representatives rejected the President's proposal when it came before this House on an expedited procedure. We said then that we would offer another opportunity on the supplemental appropriations bill, and that is what we did. Now it is suddenly contended that that was unfair.

In fact, it went beyond the original commitment in offering fairness. If normal procedure had been followed any such proposal would have been referred to committee.

If the gentleman will permit, Mr. Chairman, I would move at this time that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to rise.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOTT. Does this mean that we will not resolve, that there will not be a vote on this issue today?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It is a straight motion to rise.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] withdraw his motion temporarily?

Does the gentleman yield to the distinguished Speaker?

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized for 5 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, may I say when this bill came to the House and the Congress accomplished its will, during the time previous to the debate I talked with the members of my party. Many of them were very much concerned that the McCurdy amendment have an opportunity. I guaranteed them at that time that this bill would be up on the Tuesday after the week we came back, April 15. And I also said that any other Member who had an amendment that they want to offer, they would be able to offer it. That meant Democrats and Republicans.

Now let me say this: In the discussion "how do we get a vehicle, how do we get a vehicle?" do we file the legislation? If we do, it goes to the appropriate committees, it is assigned to a subcommittee, then to the full committee. There is no way possible I could fulfill the commitment that I gave to those people who had asked for the McCurdy amendment or any other amendment if we want that process.

It was clearly understood to them, clearly understood to them.

The minority leader called me and asked me, he hoped they would get a fair shot. I said, let me look and see what we could do.

There was no vehicle out there. Only one vehicle that we knew that was coming along, the supplementary appropriation budget. So we attached it to the supplementary appropriation budget, and anybody that came and asked me for an amendment I said "Go to the Rules Committee. If you can convince the Committee on Rules, then fine."

I have made a commitment that there is going to be a vote on that day.

Now let me say I think that we did everything humanly possible so I could keep my word. And it was done. I understand, of course, last Monday that you placed a bill before the House. I believe you, Mr. Republican Leader, and your Republican whip, Mr. LOTT, filed a rule. I think you have something like 7 days before you can get the signatures. Then under the call of the discharge calendar you may bring it up. If you can go that process, that is the rule of the House. No way am I going to stop you. No way can I stop you.

You must get 218 signatures to discharge. You understand that. Where are we now? Where are we now?

The gentleman from Washington has offered a motion to rise. We will rise and that means that we will not bring the bill up again. Fine, we will go back to the Rules Committee and we will get a clean rule on the supplemental, nothing to do with Central America whatsoever.

If on the prescribed day your bill comes up it will be brought to the floor, and we will go through the process as provided in that rule.

So with that, the schedule for the remainder of the week would be that we would rise, we would go back to the Rules Committee and bring a supplementary appropriations bill up next week, possibly Tuesday because we only meet until Wednesday of next week, Thursday and Friday being off because of the religious holidays. On Thursday, tomorrow, I believe there is a labor bill. We would hope to complete that bill tomorrow, and that would finish the session for the week.

So I wonder if the gentleman from Washington would make a motion at this time that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. FOLEY. I will yield for a parliamentary inquiry from the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. O'NEILL. The chairman should recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma.

A little levity is good for the House.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, under the procedure here might I inquire as to the Chair's understanding as to the status of the amendment that is offered by this gentleman and seven other Members of this body, under the procedure as outlined by the minority leader?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman that under the rule his amendment could be considered today only if the Hamilton amendment was rejected in the Committee of the Whole. But the Hamilton amendment in the nature of a substitute having been adopted, the gentleman's amendment cannot be considered in the Committee of the Whole, whether or not the Committee rises.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

□ 1525

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, the question is, if we do not rise and we continue with amendments today, I am asking what would happen on the votes? For example, if the Committee rises, we would then have a vote on the Hamilton amendment in the House; is that what would happen?

The CHAIRMAN. If the Committee rises in regular form, under the rule form, the Hamilton amendment would be put to a vote in the House.

Mr. ASPIN. If the Hamilton amendment is voted down at that point, what is before the House at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The original House Joint Resolution 601. A straight motion to recommit would be in order before the question is put on passage.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion. I move that the Committee do now rise.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that under the rule, had we gone through the amendment process on the Contra aid proposition and the rule would not have foreclosed our messaging that issue over to the other body, we could have had, in effect, a freestanding proposition here? But it was the rule itself that dictated those two together?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not stating a parliamentary inquiry that the Chairman of Committee of the Whole can answer.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WHITLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 601) relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, had come to no resolution thereon.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, what is the present status? The committee has risen, so there will be no further consideration of the Contra aid or the supplemental today; is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, could the Chair then advise the Members as to what the schedule would be for the balance of the day.

The SPEAKER. There is no legislation for the balance of the day. Tomorrow the labor legislation will be considered.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the subject of the special order today by the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order today by the gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4420, MILITARY RETIREMENT REFORM ACT OF 1986

Mr. WHEAT, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-537) on the resolution (H. Res. 421) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4420) to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise the retirement system for new members of the uniformed services, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

IN MEMORY OF H. CARL MOULTRIE I

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House the Delegate from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I and other Members would like to pay tribute to the late H. Carl Moultrie I, who served as chief judge of the D.C. Superior Court.

In his lifetime, Carl Moultrie received many awards and honors, all of them, richly deserved. He was actively involved in community service since the beginning of his career. Noteworthy among his activities in this respect are: president, D.C. branch NAACP; member, board of directors, Council of Churches, Washington, DC; chairman, D.C. Commission on Human Rights; Chair, nominating committee, American Lung Association; member, board of directors, Pretrial Services Agency, Washington, DC; vice president, Bloomingdale Civic Association, Washington, DC; chairman, D.C. Housing Committee, Inter-Boundary Neighborhood Council; member, board of directors and executive committee, D.C. Citizens for Better Public Education, just to name a few.

As chief judge of the D.C. Superior Court, Carl Moultrie brought many far-reaching reforms to that system. He instituted an innovative Child Support Enforcement Program in 1983 through which child support orders are routinely monitored for compliance. He convinced the American Bar Association to select the District of Columbia to run a national model program in dispute resolution that in just 1 year has attracted the attention of judges and criminal justice experts. Another important judicial contribution is the District's experimental multidoor courthouse which provides a growing number of District residents with alternatives in litigation.

In addressing a group of dignitaries gathered to launch the multidoor program, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger applauded Judge Moultrie's leadership and vision—so do I.

Chief Judge Moultrie increased public access to the court in other ways as well. He brought special services to the city's Spanish-speaking community by the translation of frequently used court forms into Spanish and the display of bilingual information signs in the court. His work with the small claims court pioneered the needs of cases otherwise neglected.

Carl Moultrie's energy and commitment to mankind will be missed. To his family I extend my deepest sympathy upon their loss of husband and father, for the rest of us, the memory of the important contributions of this great man will serve as an inspiration in our lives.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, amidst the important House affairs fixed on today's agenda, I have designated as one of my top priorities a few moments to reflect upon the death, but more importantly, the life work of a great man, H. Carl Moultrie I.

Coming from a small town in Charleston, SC, among other notable achievements, he went forward to become a lawyer, president of the D.C. NAACP, an associate judge for 6 years and eventually to serve in the capacity as chief judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, a position which he held from 1978 until the time of his death. Although he is well known for the many outstanding, significant contributions which he made to society, he is most recognized for the achievements he made while serving as chief judge.

Without a doubt, he met the pledges he made to the commission in 1978, and to the citizens of the District of Columbia as he was appointed chief judge. He implemented a number of far-reaching reforms that have increased the access of District residents to justice and improved the overall administration of the court system in the District of Columbia.

Judge Moultrie forced the D.C. Superior Court to the forefront of judicial reform by addressing the needs of families and children who are put to risk by the nonpayment of court-ordered child support, instituting an innovative Child Support Enforcement Program in 1983.

As Langston Hughes forever lives through the continuous reading of his magnificent poetry, so lives H. Carl Moultrie through the constant reflection upon the outstanding contributions which he made to society, as well as through the impressions he placed on the hearts and minds of so many. H. Carl Moultrie, a man who gave a new meaning to commitment and excellence will be sorely missed.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to join my colleagues in paying tribute today to H. Carl Moultrie I, chief judge of the District of Columbia Superior Court. Judge Moultrie fell victim to cancer only weeks after publicly announcing his condition. His loss is a great one to every resident of the District of Columbia, for his accomplishments in their behalf are incalculable.

His entire adult life was characterized by service to others, and he brought his unique leadership qualities to everything he touched. Characteristically, he labored until the very end. But it was a labor of love, and I am certain that when he realized that the end was near, he felt saddened by goals not yet achieved. With no thoughts of self, he would have regretted not having spent more time at improving a judicial system that under his stewardship went from an uncertain infancy to become in many respects a model for the rest of the country.

Typically, Judge Moultrie would counter praise with a frank assessment of how much better some accomplishment could have been had he only done one additional thing or another. Not one to bask in the glory of achievement, Judge Moultrie would be discussing plans for the next step while others celebrated the achievement of the first step. Yet he did not seek change for the sake of change.

Countless times, in the face of congressional indifference or opposition, he was able to steer a steady course, all the while quietly and effectively convincing our colleagues that certain reforms were prudent and justified. It is to his personal credit that many innovative programs are now hallmarks of the local judiciary. During his tenure, he managed to maintain and improve the courts, oftentimes a very difficult task with the competing demands and suggestions of the council, the mayor, and assorted personalities in Congress. Yet he managed to balance and satisfy these demands, and in the process improve the situation not for himself, not for his colleagues on the bench, but for the residents of this city.

He was, in the truest sense of the term, a gentleman. His style was aggressive, but never abrasive or confrontational. Although devoid of political ambition, he possessed the knowledge that through compromise, accord is achieved. He had the ability to shepard together those with radically different aims, and perhaps more significant, to make all interests feel appeased. It was not through strict adherence to his position that he made such accomplishments, but through quiet diplomacy and the sincere belief that he, too, could be wrong. Seldom if ever did he accept credit for what was clearly his personal accomplishment.

To his family and friends, I express my deepest sympathy. And to those who did not know him well, I would end my comments with something I believe Judge Moultrie himself would say. Do not dwell on today, for there is much more to be done. Carl would wish that those in Congress and on the bench not spend that precious commodity of time singing his praises, but rather on striving to achieve the goals he set toward the betterment of life for all citizens of this city. I hope that we can honor his memory by doing just that.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the metropolitan area owes a debt of gratitude to an exemplary public servant who distinguished himself over the years as a civic leader, advocate, and jurist. The death of Judge H. Carl Moultrie I, chief judge of the D.C. Superior Court, will be mourned by all who were aware of his service and contributions to the community.

Many in this area knew Judge Moultrie best in his role as jurist, but the range of his activities prior to his appointment to the bench say a lot about the man and his compassion for humanity. As a young man he was a journalist, social worker, executive director of a Boys Club, probation officer, housing project manager, executive secretary of Omega Psi Phi, civil rights leader, and lawyer for the poor. All of these roles prepared him well for his work on the D.C. Superior Court.

As chief judge he rose to the challenges of the job with skill and sensitivity. He encouraged innovation and put reforms in place that leave his clear imprint on the work of the court. He instituted a court Child Support Enforcement Program to monitor and enforce child support orders, he established a sentencing guidelines commission to reduce disparate criminal sentences, and instituted arbitration and mediation facilities to encourage use of those measures as an easier and less expensive means of dispute resolution.

The city has lost an impressive and compassionate jurist who will not be easily replaced. We were fortunate to have an individual of his caliber serving the community.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, the subject of my special order this evening—actually, this afternoon, since we stopped business so abruptly—is going to be on the question of capital punishment and the necessity of our enacting legislation in the very near future.

But before I get into that, I would like to discuss, just for a few moments, with some of my colleagues what has occurred here today, because I think, in fact, it is extemely important for us to discuss it for a few moments, at least.

On our side of the aisle, Mr. Speaker, many Members felt that, although we had the opportunity to go to the Rules Committee, oftentimes the die is already cast. Perhaps that has something to do with the markup of the Rules Committee being 9 to 4, 9 Democrats to 4 Republicans, and anybody who has any idea of mathematics can figure out the odds of attempting to get a rule in our favor.

But, nonetheless, at least on our side of the aisle we had expected an opportunity to have a free-standing vote on the President's package. We understand the separation of powers, the executive branch and the legislative branch; we understand that we are required to legislate here and that we have the opportunity to set our own rules. But those on our side of the aisle, in keeping with the notion that politics ends at the water's edge, thought that at least the President of the United States should have the opportuntity to have an important issue debated, at least given a chance to be debated on his terms.

We happen to have a predominant, an overwhelming support for the President's position on that issue on our side, and yet, despite our attempts to get a free-standing vote, that was denied us.

It is a very difficult decision for Members of Congress to vote for the Barnes-Hamilton amendment when in fact we think it does not meet the needs of Central America. It is particularly difficult for those of us from the Southwest portion of the United States who perhaps most acutely feel the effects of the instability of Central America to vote in that way. But as our distinguished leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], said, when you have been given a stacked rule, when you have been given an unconventional rule, you have to respond in unconventional fashion. We responded in an unconventional fashion today. And I think, Mr. Speaker, you have made it very clear as to what the terms of the game are now. I think you very clearly stated that if the President is to have his opportunity for a free-standing vote on a question of major concern to the American people, he will have to do it by means of a discharge petition. Quoting you in earlier session, Mr. Speaker, when we had the ERA up, you said it was your prerogative to establish the calendar, it is your prerogative to bring bills to the floor. You have now made it clear that if we are to get a free-standing vote for the President of the United States on an issue of central importance to Central America, we will be required to go the discharge petition route.

So I hope all the Members will heed your words and recognize that if we are to respond to a very important issue we are going to have to do that, because, as you have said, there is no other way.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that an important precedent has been established today, and that is the rule that in very important foreign matters, whether they be issues in which we think the Democrat side of the aisle is going to prevail or the Republican side of the aisle, those issues should not be framed in a manner which bogs them down procedurally, and procedural mechanisms should not be utilized to prevent the President of the United States from at least having his shot at an important issue. I think that is restating, to some degree, Sam Rayburn's statement that politics ends at the water's edge.

I would like to say, as a Member of the Republican Party on this side of the aisle—and I think this is a clear feeling over here—as a Republican, it is my intention and I think the intention of many Members on this side of the aisle, that this same rule will be applied when there is a Democrat President, that he will have a fair shot at getting a vote on his issues which he deems to be of great national importance in the public affairs area. I think it is reasonable, it comports with our tradition in the past, and I think what the Republican leader, ROBERT MICHEL, did today was completely in keeping with that tradition.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman.

I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to point out that what we saw this afternoon is an example of the frustration that the minority often feels, with the kind of arrogance of power we see demonstrated by the majority party in this body.

What has happened with regard to the Rules Committee—and the gentleman from California rightfully points out—with a 2 to 1 plus 1 majority that exists on the Rules Committee, literally the rules are being written, and particularly important rules of this type, in the Democratic caucus. The Republicans are not even being consulted. The Republicans are being told what the rule is. We have no chance for input. Legitimate amendments that are wanting to be offered by even the minority leader of the House are rejected out of hand. The minority is stuck with procedures that we had no hand in developing, and we are being told, "Take it or leave it."

Well, today what we are faced with was an absolutely fraudulent procedure. It was a procedure that by virtually unanimous feeling on this side of the aisle was a procedure without merit. So it was decided on this side of the aisle to use the majority's own procedure against them, because they designed it and so, therefore, if there were a way that the minority could exact a penalty for that design, we were determined to do it.

It is a shame that the merits of an issue have to get lost in that kind of process. But the fact is that the processes of this House are tied up in the rules that the majority, first of all, foist upon this body on the opening day and then continues to change, at will, as we go through the process. That is changed, then, by overwhelming majorities in key committees, such as the Appropriations Committee that was bringing the whole bill to the floor, and the Rules Committee that designed this particular bad rule. And we saw the venting of a minority opinion today that the majority simply has taken an arrogance of power unto itself, which is totally unacceptable. Perhaps the message was so clear today that, ultimately, we will get some fairness in this body. We are a little sick and tired, in all honesty, of hearing everything described from that side being talked about as fair when in fact we know that it is fundamentally unfair. Perhaps we will achieve some true fairness at some point here.

Mr. LUNGREN. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the point I would like to underscore is that this is an issue of major significance. There was debate on both sides, talking about how it is a controversial issue, how the decisions made on this issue will not only affect us in the next 18 months but the next 5 years and the next 10 years. And I agree with that. It does appear to me that if it is that important, then it really merits being dealt with on its own, standing alone, and the President of the United States ought to be accorded the courtesy of at least having his view voted on singly—if it is that important. And so if in fact it is not mere rhetoric to describe this issue in the terms that it was described on both sides, we do a disservice to the seriousness of the issue by, as our friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE], said, trivializing it with this type of a rule.

I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I would like to talk for a moment about that rule, because I watched that rule being made. Of course, as I went through my civics classes as a youngster, I heard a great deal of what we do in this country to protect against the tyranny of the majority. As we know, there is about a 2-to-1 majority of the Democrat Party versus the Republican Party on the Rules Committee. I stayed very late last Thursday afternoon, while most of the Members had gotten on their way back to their districts, to testify, on behalf of myself and 70 other cosigners of a letter that I had, against the rule that would waive the rules of the House that prohibit legislation in appropriations bills. As I sat through the process and watched person after person go before this committee and ask for further waivers of the prohibition against legislation so they could make even additional legislation in this appropriation bill, and watched the gentlewoman from Colorado asking for a rule that would allow her to include legislation that would prohibit further nuclear tests, we had an interruption in the proceedings as Congressman LOTT, one of our leaders on our side, the minority whip and a member of the Committee on Rules, inquired regarding the continued process and when the rule would be completed.

I was, frankly, appalled to see the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR], a majority member of that committee, tell Mr. LOTT that they had a rule.

Now, this was during the time when the proceedings were going on and the testimony and the requests were coming in. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR], told the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], a member of the committee, "We have a rule, and when we finish the proceedings here we will be happy to tell you what that rule is."

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], was, obviously, taken aback and asked if Mr. BONIOR thought he might like that. Mr. BONIOR said—and, I might add, quite smugly—"We believe there will be some things in the rule we have that you will like."

Further discussion of the matter was ruled out.

It became clear to me at that point, after I had canceled my travel arrangements twice already on that day, was preparing to do it again so that I could stay and make my request on behalf of myself and 70 other Members of the House who had signed my letter, that that would be a futile effort because, as the majority Member reported during the proceedings, they had the rule and they would tell us what it was after the proceedings were over.

Mr. LUNGREN. If I might recapture my time, I suppose the gentleman's feelings on that matter were colored somewhat—your feelings, that is—by the makeup of the committee, that is, 9-to-4 majority to minority, that is, you go in there figuring your chances are not very good to begin with.

Mr. ARMEY. Well, certainly we had that concern; but we did feel that with the strength of a letter signed by 70 Members of Congress, an ability to try to make that case, as clearly a bipartisan request from Members of both sides of the aisle, that we would get consideration.

Mr. LUNGREN. As I understand it, the gentleman got every bit as much consideration as the President of the United States did.

Mr. ARMEY. I might point out that in Texas, in the old days, we used to give them a fair trial and then hang them. But in this case the hanging took place before the trial. I think that is what disturbed me.

Mr. LUNGREN. I think there is an old description of it. It is called: Ready, shoot, aim.

It is one of the ways we do business around here if you have got the votes in your favor.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, just for the record, I would like to correct some impressions.

The gentleman from Washington, before this House at the end of the last vote, implied that the gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader, was ignoring the will of the American people and felt that the American people really did not know what was going on in Nicaragua.

What the gentleman from Illinois was doing was quoting from a poll done by the New York Times-CBS News. And in that poll, I think it is instructive to repeat, only 38 percent of those polled know that the administration is supporting the Contras and not the Government in Nicaragua.

So a minority of the American citizens polled knew whose side we were on. A majority did not know who the United States was backing.

As to the nature of the Sandinista regime, just 20 percent of the people polled think it is Communist. Approximately an equal number, 19 percent, think it is a right wing dictatorship. Forty-nine percent have not the slightest idea of what ideology the Sandinistas have.

This is an astounding fact, but the minority leader was not stating that the American people are not being listened to, but he was stating that this issue is not the best understood issue to come along.

Mr. LUNGREN. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks. I think to underscore what the gentleman said, it is a fact that we have not had the debate that is necessary to move the country toward a full appreciation of what the stakes are in Central America. We are just beginning that debate.

One of the things we have done in terms of the President's speeches, the debate that has gone on within the White House, the debate that has gone on here, is just to initiate the debate. In fact, it seems to me we do a disservice to the American people by cloaking the debate with this kind of a rule, that instead of allowing you to get to the issue and having it free standing, hides the rules behind the supplemental that is as full of pork as our minority leader said yesterday as a film festival on Porky Pig.

I mean, it is astounding that an issue this important, that is not as fully understood in this body as well as in the public at large would be hidden behind the doors of a supplemental on things that have absolutely nothing to do with this issue at all.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman would just yield back for a moment, I would appreciate it.

Mr. LUNGREN. Certainly.

Mr. RITTER. It would be interesting if the American people were presented with the fact before the question was asked, if they were presented with the fact that Libya and Qadhafi work hand in glove with Nicaragua and the Sandinista Communists, what would their response be?

How many of the American people would know that Qadhafi and Ortega and D'Escoto raised their fists in solidarity, while Qadhafi makes the statement that, "We fight with the Nicaraguans because they fight the United States on their own grounds."

How many Americans if they knew the Libya-Sandinista connection would oppose the President's policies in Central America?

Mr. LUNGREN. I would say to the gentleman, knowing the intelligence of the American people, I think that question answers itself. I think the American people would strongly support it.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LEWIS of California. I appreciate my colleague from California yielding.

I wonder if the gentleman would continue a colloquy with me. I have followed the Nicaraguan issue with great care and spent a good deal of time on it since 1979 when we arrived here in this body. As I remember at that point in time, the debate that we watched as new Members involved a discussion that suggested that America had joined forces to pressure change in Nicaragua. We pressured Somoza out and that the Sandinistas were making this great promise, that is, they were going to bring about a democratic process, democratic institutions, free press, no oppression of the church, et cetera, et cetera.

Others said, "Wait a minute. That change looks to us that there could be some problems."

Some suggested that maybe even some Communists had an interest there. The debate raged here.

The House made a decision to go with hope and so they decided to give a good deal of money over there, that is quite a few years ago, some $120 million to that new Sandinista group.

I guess we know that some of our Members actually believe that somehow we walked away from the Sandinistas.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, could I ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. LUNGREN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. RITTER. Let me ask the gentleman from California a question. Did the gentleman vote for that assistance to the newly emerging revolutionary government, I know I did. I know the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HENRY HYDE, did. We had hope.

We tried to work with them. Our Government gave them significant development loans, probably more than in the entire history of the Somoza regime; so it is not as if those of us who are standing here promoting aid to the Contras were not on the side of a good democratic revolution in Nicaragua when it happened.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LUNGREN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LEWIS of California. The gentleman makes a very good point. Of course, we came together in a bipartisan way in the House and said it looks as though there is a chance for pluralism. It looks as though there is a chance for democracy and expanded economic opportunity within Nicaragua. There was bipartisan support to help this promise succeed, but the warnings were real as well. We made the decision to vote for hope, but then at the next step we found ourselves in a circumstance where a few within that new organization had plans of their own. The Ortega brothers and their friends who now we call the Commandantes had been laying the foundation to capture the democratic people's revolution and take it over.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on that particular point?

Mr. LUNGREN. I am happy to yield for just a short time.

Mr. RITTER. We know that 6 months after the Sandinistas took power in Managua, Nicaragua, 6 months after, there was a training group of some 600 Salvadorans who transmitted illegally through Nicaragua, got their papers, got their air fare, got their safe house preparations and went to Cuba to study terrorism and warfare, to make war back in their home country of El Salvador; so it really does seem that from the outset the Sandinistas had these kinds of terrorist aims in mind.

I might add that today when I and others brought up the Sandinistas-Libya connection, the intimacy of that connection, the intimacy of the terrorist relationship, the intimacy of the arms transfers from Libya to Nicaragua, no one on the other side of the aisle, no one denied that connection. I thought that was interesting.

What they tried to say was Libya was different from Nicaragua. Yes, it is in a different place in the world. Nicaragua is a lot closer to home. What they tried to say was that Libya exports terrorism and Nicaragua does not. This is patently untrue. It is patently in denial of objective reality.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman just let me complete my last sentence?

Mr. LUNGREN. Yes.

Mr. RITTER. The Sandinistas do export terrorism, as we know from the M-19 assault on the Palace of Justice which was with arms supplied by the Sandinistas and a memorial mass was held with Thomas Borge himself present in Managua.

They also said this morning that we have tried negotiations with the Libyans before, but we did not do this with the Sandinistas.

Again, nothing could be further from objective reality. We have negotiated far, far more before these actions with the Sandinistas than we have with the Libyans, so there really was not any counter whatsoever to the danger of the Libyan-Nicaraguan connection to the region and to the citizens of the United States of America.

I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LUNGREN. I yield to the gentleman from California one last time.

Mr. LEWIS of California. I appreciate my colleague yielding.

I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been very helpful to me in this debate in this sense. I have been very, very much aware of the disappointment of my colleagues who for long standing have been supporting the hope for democracy in the Central American region. They have been not just disappointed, but embarrassed by the Sandinistas robbing the people of their revolution, of Ortega and his Commandantes committing themselves publicly to a Marxist-Leninist regime, indicating clearly that their revolution no longer was a Nicaraguan revolution, but one without borders in the region; indeed threatening Mexico and eventually the United States.

It is very clear that they immediately began to suppress a free expression. The press is endlessly censored. The church has been humiliated. It is obvious the slaughter that has been the experience of the Miskito Indians is evidence of their lack of care for humanity.

I had not known of the deep connection with Libya. The American people are reacting strongly enough as it is in my judgment when they learned that Ortega is trying to consolidate a Communist Cuba like state in our hemisphere, but to learn of this linkage to Qadhafi and Libya just compounds that.

If the American people ever in depth get the message of what is happening in our hemisphere, clearly they will ask us to do an awful lot more than we are suggesting by this aid to the freedom fighters, the Nicaraguan democrats who want to recapture their revolution. They are about to recapture that hope which they held so high, a hope for freedom and democracy and the elimination of political oppression in Nicaragua.

I really appreciate my colleague taking this time and yielding so much of it to me and to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

I might just mention that there is no doubt about the fact that the Sandinistas have violated the terms of their own revolution.

It is not Ronald Reagan that came to this conclusion. Let us recall it was President Jimmy Carter who made the decision to suspend aid after the United States had made sure that more aid went to the Sandinista regime in its first 2 years of existence than had gone in all the previous 18 years to the Somoza regime.

Mr. Speaker, after that brief interlude on discussing what occurred here today and the ramifications, I would like to get into the topic of my discussion on capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, last November, the Gallup organization released a startling survey of American attitudes toward the death penalty. Three out of every four Americans, Gallup estimates, now favor capital punishment for murderers—the highest total in the poll's history. Despite these figures, and despite the present ability of terrorists and assassins to escape the ultimate punishment, Congress has largely remained silent on the issue.

Today, my colleagues and I hope to demonstrate that the cause of justice and the safety of Americans, mandate legislative action on behalf of capital punishment. Public opinion is plainly at odds with the consequences of the Supreme Court's decisions on this subject, decisions that have brought into question the constitutionality of all but two of the Federal death penalty statutes. But the role of capital punishment as a deterrent, as an instrument of societal protection, as an answer to espionage and terrorism, and as a guideline for the relative gravity of crimes, is also at odds with the ramifications of those decisions. The inescapable need for these functions of capital punishment makes legislation permitting it not just important, but urgent.

In 1972, the Supreme Court shattered a nationwide consensus on capital punishment by issuing its famous decision, Furman versus Georgia. While the Court declared only the death penalties of Georgia and—in a companion case—Texas, unconstitutional, its decision had the effect of invalidating capital punishment in 37 States and the District of Columbia. At that time many commentators felt that the Court provided no specific rationale for its ruling. But the majority appeared to agree that the death penalty must not be left to the unbridled discretion of a judge or jury. Only Justices Brennan and Marshall contended that the death penalty itself constituted cruel and unusual punishment. And Chief Justice Burger made the following observation in his dissenting opinion: "* * * legislative bodies may seek to bring their laws into compliance with the Court's ruling by providing standards for juries to follow in determining the sentence in capital cases or by more narrowly defining the crimes for which the penalty is to be imposed." Though the Court closed the door on capital punishment, it left a window open through which reformed statutes could reappear.

Subsequently, the Supreme Court considered additional State death penalty laws. In these cases, the Court has clearly held that the death penalty is constitutional if it avoids the arbitrary and capricious application cited in Furman versus Georgia. Since that decision, 38 States have revised their laws to provide for the death penalty under the requirements of that decision and other decisions of the Supreme Court which followed it. In other words, over 75 percent of the States have concluded that the death penalty should be available as a punishment for certain offenses. Even the State of Oregon, often viewed as a haven of liberal opinions in the West, joined the emerging consensus in favor of the death penalty in 1984, when the State legislature approved its use for the crime of aggravated murder.

But, at the same time, the Federal Government lags behind. Thanks to the labors of our colleague BILL MCCOLLUM of Florida, this body recently approved capital punishment for members of our Armed Forces convicted of espionage during peacetime. In 1974, the Congress passed a bill which provided for the death penalty for persons convicted of air piracy. Yet that's the sum and substance of Congress' actions. It has consistently refused to move beyond these narrow parameters. As Assistant Attorney General Stephen Trott has noted, "Incredibly, the maximum punishment that can be imposed by a Federal court for the murder of the President, of a Member of Congress, or of an ordinary citizen committed on some Federal property is less than could be imposed by most State courts if they had jurisdiction or were free to exercise it."

Such limits or shortcomings on punishment for deadly crimes plainly lack the support of the American people. I have already observed that 75 percent of the American people support the death penalty for individuals convicted of murder. But this is only part of the story. Only 17 percent of the poll respondents opposed the death penalty for murder, a stunning contrast with the 47 percent who opposed it in 1966. The poll indicated that 75 percent of Americans support capital punishment for persons convicted of murdering the President, while 57 percent support the death penalty for those who attempt to assassinate the President.

It is an irony, a paradox in this country, that had John Hinckley committed a murder in the course of skyjacking an aircraft in order to get to Washington, DC, to assassinate the President, and had he been successful in assassinating the President, he could have gotten the death penalty for the skyjacking offense, the murder involved in the skyjacking, but he could not have gotten the death penalty for successfully assassinating the President of the United States.

How in the world, I must ask, can we explain this disjunction between the views of the American people and the actions of their Representatives in Washington? Are the Members of Congress somehow possessed of wisdom that surpasses that of their constituents in this matter? Is this one of those rare, actual examples of national statesmanship where a courageous stand against the prevailing public sentiment is, in fact, the correct one?

I would argue, Mr. Speaker, this is not the case; that in fact the American people have a better understanding of the usefulness and the moral underpinnings of the death penalty. They are aware, for example, that the death example does in fact function as a deterrent.

Some of my colleagues may recall a recent episode of "60 Minutes" that featured the police chief in Charleston, SC. This police chief, who has a Ph.D. in sociology, was asked how he felt about the death penalty. He observed that in the inner cities of America, mobsters sometimes employ so-called bag ladies to transport their illicit cash. This might seem to some a rather risky method of transporting hundreds of dollars in profits, even thousands of dollars in profits. Any young gang member could easily overcome one of these frail, elderly individuals, but the chief emphasized that nobody does. Why? The answer is that the mob has made it perfectly clear that anyone who harms these seemingly helpless couriers will not survive the escapade. In other words, the mob in America has supplied an effective deterrent to the victimization of its servants through the threat of "capital punishment." Of course, this is not offered as an example of the moral equivalent situation, that is, that somehow we should mimic organized crime; rather, I cite it as evidence of the fact of deterence provided by capital punishment.

If the mobsters can recognize this, if they can use a potential death penalty to protect their fellow criminals, why can we not use it to protect the hardworking, law-abiding citizens of the United States? Yet, in spite of this clearcut example and others, we should note that some would still deny the possible deterrent effect of the death penalty.

Opponents of the death penalty often argue that criminals are so generically distinct from other people, so irrational, that they would slay someone without considering that such an act would cost them their own lives. Frankly, I find it impossible to believe that all putative murderers lack intelligence and that all putative murderers commit their acts without substantial precognition.

Jack Abbott, the convicted murderer who was pronounced a literary wunderkind by no less than Norman Mailer, gives the lie to such generalizations. So, too, does an incident related to me recently by a member of my staff. He recalls that during his senior year in high school, a State prison rehabilitation program brought three convicts to his civics class to discuss the woes of prison life. One student asked the convicts how they felt about the death penalty. Not suprisingly, two of them replied that they opposed it. But the third convict, the one who had committed murder, said that he felt the death penalty did function as a deterrent. An insurance agent before his crime, he stated that the existence of the death penalty in California at that time might have prevented him from taking a life.

I also recall, Mr. Speaker, hearing from Vincent Bugliosi. He was the assistant district attorney in Los Angeles, who successfully convicted Charles Manson and his crowd. He happened to interview a number of criminals as they sat in incarceration, and these were people who had committed their crimes before the death penalty was declared unconstitutional in California. These were people who, based on the description of the crime, he was able to surmise probably could have gotten away with the crime if they had killed the only witnesses to their crime, and they had ample opportunity to kill the witnesses. He asked them, "Why did you not kill the witnesses to your crime when you knew that killing them would basically make it very difficult if not impossible for you to be prosecuted?"

These people sitting in incarceration told Vincent Bugliosi, assistant district attorney of Los Angeles County, that they refrained from killing the witnesses because they feared the chamber. What is "the chamber?" It is the gas chamber in California. These are people who have been there, who had ample opportunity. Even worse than that now is the fact that you can talk with police officers around this country who will tell you when they have interviewed folks who have killed the only individuals who were, they thought, available to testify later on as to the crime, that they did it specifically because they thought it would make it impossible to be prosecuted. We have instance after instance in State after State in which people, after being victimized, who offered no resistance to a crime, are killed by the perpetrators of the crime, and the only logical reason that exists for them doing that is so that they rub out the witnesses and they know they do not have to fear the death penalty.

If anybody has looked at the recent review done by the Department of Justice of the average sentence served by someone in the United States convicted of murder and given life imprisonment, they know that life imprisonment means a couple of years, maybe a decade at most.

In an April 1985 issue of the New Republic, Mayor Ed Koch illustrated the power of the death penalty in an equally concrete manner. "Consider the tragic death of Rosa Velez, who happened to be home when a man named Luis Vera burglarized her apartment in Brooklyn. 'Yeah, I shot her,' Vera admitted, 'She knew me, and I knew I wouldn't go to the chair.'" The absence of the death penalty, it seems, may not only permit more murders, but murders with impunity and the arrogance manifested by Mr. Vera.

The question of deterrence has special relevance for a group long neglected by the U.S. Congress, that is, the officers of our Federal prisons. Stephen Trott, the Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division of the Justice Department, addressed this issue in a letter to the editor he composed in 1984. The letter responded to a Los Angeles Times editorial which condemned the death penalty as "morally impermissible." Trott noted the "serious problem of protecting prison officers and prison inmates from dangerous prisoners who are serving life sentences for murder without the possibility of parole. Five Federal prison officers have been killed during the last 14 months by inmates serving natural life sentences for the crime of murder. Is it a just result that no additional punishment be imposed for such heinous crimes, leaving such inmates to murder with impunity? Is it morally permissible to leave inmates and prison officers at the 'mercy' of such savage killers?

"Rather than print literary quotes from William Styron to support your opinion, I would like to see instead what you would offer to the families of prison officers killed in the line of duty about what is and is not 'morally permissible.'

"Styron's words, as repeated by you, serve as no comfort whatsoever to widows and children deprived of their husbands and fathers. What kind of obligation do we have to them and those officers against whom prisoners have not yet exacted the death penalty? I submit that it is an obligation to protect them to the constitutional limit of our capacity by imposing the death penalty as a sanction against such hideous behavior."

Trott's observations have been supported by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, Joseph DiGenova. In a 1984 interview with the Washington Times, DiGenova commented: "The thing I find most disturbing about the lack of capital punishment is the increasing number of prison guards who are being murdered. There is no other way to deter that behavior. Inmates who are in prison for a long period of time can essentially get a free ride. They are in jail already and can kill guards with impunity."

Finally, we cannot forget the brutal murders carried out within the maximum security section of the Federal penitentiary at Marion, IL. The first incident at Marion involved an inmate who used a knife to inflict over 40 stab wounds on a correctional officer. This senseless act was committed in full view of other staff and inmates. The second incident in that same day involved an inmate who apparently slipped out of his handcuffs and stabbed an officer with a homemade knife. As other staff members rushed to assist the officer, one of them was wounded and another stabbed to death. As one can imagine, this has not only been a tragedy for the families of the slain officers but for the entire Federal law enforcement system as well.

In my opinion, Members of Congress have a moral responsibility to consider whether they can continue to ask prison guards to perform their functions. Those men not only provide essential services in the most grim of settings, but they do so at serious risk to their lives. The death penalty is the only sanction available to us to help dissuade long-term convicts from additional brutality in prison. And yet we in the Congress have refused to do what we can to deter hardened felons from maiming and murdering these public servants.

But the death penalty serves an even more elemental function than the deterrence of criminals from committing heinous acts. It protects society from its most dangerous members. When the death penalty is imposed upon murderers, it preserves the lives of individuals from those murderers who might otherwise have been released on parole, only to kill again. Some doubt that such horrible things can happen. Surely, they say, our Government officials would not permit highly dangerous people, people who have killed and are perfectly capable of killing again, from roaming the streets. But Government officials can in fact permit such developments. Two weeks ago, the Bureau of Justice Statistics, a division of the Department of Justice, released a report that outlined a significant pattern of leniency in State prisons. The report indicated that over 50 percent of the convicted murderers freed from prison in 1983 had served terms of less than 7 years. Over 700 people with life sentences were released from prison in 1983—and those only in the 21 States examined by the bureau. According to a Washington Post account of the report, "The survey of more than 300,000 criminal cases . . . also found that 18 percent of those sentenced to life imprisonment served 3 years or less before being released." Finally, the study noted that the median time for a life sentence is less than 9 years. Speaking frankly, I can only surmise from such statistics that in certain localities the term "life sentence" has lost its meaning.

One may recall the case of Theodore Streleski, a graduate student at Stanford who clubbed his professor to death with a hammer. Streleski said that he was frustrated with his professor over not being awarded a doctorate, and that his act was "morally correct." He refused to undergo pyschotherapy in prison because such actions would be "indicative of remorse." When this obviously dangerous individual became eligible for parole after just 5½ years, he opted to serve the full—albeit lenient—8 years of his term. Calling prison "a sort of utopia with constraints," he said he was happy to stay there until he could be released without any sort of constraints.

In his essay in the New Republic, Mayor Ed Koch described what can happen when this sort of individual is released. Louisiana authorities, he recounts, executed Robert Lee Willie in December 1984. He was punished for raping and then murdering an 18-year-old woman. It may be shocking to learn of such a crime. But it is astounding to discover that Willie had previously been convicted of aggravated rape, aggravated kidnaping, the murder of a Louisiana deputy and the murder of another man from Missouri.

Assistant Attorney General Stephen Trott provided an equally disturbing instance of peril in his 1984 letter to the Los Angeles Times. Replying to the editors' arguments about the death penalty, he states:

> You falsely assume that one consideration—vengeance—is served by the death penalty. Not true. The real end served by the death penalty is the protection of innocent life. Eddie Simon Wein, for example, was sentenced to death in Los Angeles Superior Court in 1957. Instead of being executed, he was released from prison in 1975 to live in West Los Angeles, without any warning to his neighbors. Within months, he began to attack and kill women in the area. Fortunately for the other potential victims, his apprehension was—relatively—swift. He was convicted in 1976 of first degree murder of one woman, attempted murder of another, and numerous sexual offenses. The woman who was killed by Wein and the woman who was scarred by him for life would not have been the victims of his crimes if Eddie Wein had been executed as originally decreed, This is a situation where the death penalty would have spared a life.

In light of these observations, it seems clear to me that Government officials cannot claim that they have acted responsibly when they have refused to take the requisite actions to prevent deadly criminals from killing again and again.

One must not forget, however, that there are criminals far more fearsome than the domestic murderer. The activities of international terrorists have spread like a wave across the entire globe, and now require legislative responses appropriate to the gravity of the terrorist threat. From the point of view of justice, it boggles the mind to consider that even if the murderers of Leon Klinghoffer were caught, brought to trial and convicted of their despicable acts, even if the judges and juries were fully aware of the cold-blooded manner in which Mr. Klinghoffer was executed, these terrorists could not suffer the maximum punishment they so richly deserve. Instead, the courts would confine them to prison, a "solution" that might bring about the worst of all possible worlds. One has only to recall the heyday of the Italian Red Brigade and the German Baader-Meinhof units to remember that the imprisonment of key terrorists only incites those still free to try to liberate their comrades. Only last year, key leaders of the deadly Japanese Red Army were released by their Israeli captors in exchange for captured Israeli soldiers. While the imprisonment of terrorists may seem to some a humane alternative to execution, it in fact only engenders additional terrorism even as the eventual freedom of such criminals remains a distinct possibility. Speaking for myself, I find nothing "humane" about such consequences.

While we must recognize the danger posed to American citizens and our national will by terrorists, we must also perceive that our national security is being vigorously assaulted by espionage. As I noted earlier, the Congress has acted to ensure that members of the Armed Forces engaging in espionage are subject to capital punishment. But civilians and employees of nonmilitary government agencies can still betray their country with only the prospect of a prison term to darken their consciences. John Walker will probably serve about 20 years in a Federal penitentiary, and he may still believe that his betrayal of sensitive command-and-control data to Moscow proved a justifiable gamble, given the lucrative financial and material rewards he received from his Soviet benefactors. Someone about to die in the electric chair could harbor no such illusions.

In an article in the June 28, 1985 edition of the Los Angeles Times, Paul Johnson, author of Modern Times, formerly editor of the New Statesman, illustrated both the seriousness of the crime of espionage and the reasons why capital punishment must be a possibility for those who commit it.

> For a citizen of a democracy under the rule of law to spy for an expansionist, totalitarian enemy falls into the most serious category of offenses that a human being is capable of committing.
> Even within this category, however, there are degrees of atrocity. The offense is more grave if the guilty man or woman is a member of the Armed Forces or other Government agency and thus is in a breach of oath and trust. The worst case of all is where the offender's position in the State service gives access to information of the highest secrecy and importance, and where this is the subject of treason.
> We have in such a case a crime of unique depravity. It is worse than mass murder, for one has to assume—and the offender, in committing it made the assumption—that the information could, in the event of war, lead to the deaths of hundreds—perhaps thousands, perhaps even millions—of compatriots, a slaughter far beyond the capacity of a single assassin.

Johnson then places espionage in the context of our own time, with its particular moral and strategic gridlocks. "In the peculiar circumstances of the Cold War, the crime acquires an added degree of wickedness. It is well known that the United States forms the only real barrier to Soviet expansion, and that if this barrier were removed, free institutions and people everywhere would be in jeopardy. It is also well known that the United States maintains this barrier largely by its technological superiority in certain arcane areas of military science.

> The original act of treason, then, would be a crime * * * against humanity, against all those who choose to live in societies based on consent and the process of law. Indeed, it would be a crime against posterity, too, for its consequences might well commit unborn generations to live their lives in servitude.

Johnson then asks, "How can a crime of this magnitude be punished adequately? It seems to me that to deprive the convicted felon of his or her life is the only way a civilized society can repond both prudently and justly.

> Prudently for two reasons: First, deterrence. The age of the ideological traitor is over, the age of the mercenary traitor has begun. For spies who convey secrets not from conviction, but for money, who are motivated by a rational calculation of greed, the death penalty is an undoubted deterrent.
> The second utilitarian calculation is that the Soviet spymasters have repeatedly taken advantage of the West's unwillingness to execute spies. Some, like British master spy George Blake, they have actually sprung from jail. They have negotiated the release of others, sometimes by arresting Western citizens on trumped-up charges. There is thus no absolute guarantee that a spy sentenced to life imprisonment will serve it. It is a comfort to actual spies and an encouragement to would-be spies that, even in the worst possible circumstances, the most they will face is prison, and that even there they are under the long, protective arm of the KGB.

It just seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have compelling evidence to suggest that the death penalty is morally justified, politically justifiable and, in fact, more than that, in some circumstances morally required if we are to remain a free society, if we are to properly punish those who would victimize innocent members of the U.S. civilization.

Mr. Speaker, it does us a disservice, it does the American people a disservice for us, the people's House, to ignore this question. There is a large debate on it and there are sincere beliefs on both sides, but we owe it to the American people to have the issue debated, and I would suggest to have the issue voted on and passed on to the President for his signature.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the ranking Republican member of the Subcommittee on Crime of the Judiciary Committee, the committee that, in fact, has jurisdiction over this question.

Mr. GEKAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding and want to commend him on the excellent statement and review of the compellingness of bringing the death penalty legislation to the floor for a final vote by the House of Representatives.

As the gentleman well knows, the reason that today we do not have the opportunity in the near future to debate this on the floor of the House is because of the staunch oppostion to it by a mere handful of the members of the Judiciary Committee. So we have had to resort over the past few years to parliamentary maneuvers and amendments on and off the floor of the House to get the message across that the majority of the House, reflecting the majority of the American people, want to lodge into the American jurisprudence a carefully crafted death penalty procedure to accompany the death penalty that is already on the books.

In that regard, I want to also commend the gentleman for participating in that dramatic moment when in subcommittee, we were able to append the death penalty, for the first stage of the proceedings at least, to the terrorism to which the gentleman alluded in his fine remarks. That means to me that we have a possibility, a good chance in the full Judiciary Committee, to revive the debate and then bring that to the floor.

But can you imagine, to add to your woes, your complaints about the absence of the death penalty, that at this very moment, God forbid if the President of the United States were the target of an assassination attempt. The death penalty would not apply. Why? Because this handful of people have chosen, for their philosophical, personal beliefs, or for other reasons, to keep it from coming to the floor.

We are going to persevere, I say to the gentleman from California, and will have a full vote one day, and because of the rationale that the gentleman espouses, and which he projected during this special order, I venture to say that we are going to succeed in having the death penalty restored to the Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I should suggest that the gentleman is one of the leaders in the House on this question. The gentleman has legislation, has pursued legislation on this matter for some time. I am hopeful, as he is, that we will have the opportunity to deal with this legislation.

But, faced with what I think is an obvious and convincing case for sanction of life against violent criminals, that is, with taking their life from violent criminals, and faced with the immediate availability of appropriate legislation, the gentleman has legislation, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] has legislation, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] has legislation, and there is other legislation that has been introduced, I wonder how people can justify the continued procrastination on the critical issue.

Apparently some of our more liberal Members in this House can and do. Some of them proclaim that the death penalty is barbaric. They say it is discriminatory, and they point to a lack of capital punishment in other democracies.

It was interesting that Mayor Koch responded to this very argument recently and he said this:

Opponents of the death penalty frequently cite the sixth of the Ten Commandments in an attempt to prove that capital punishment for a variety of offenses. The biblical viewpoint has been upheld by philosophers throughout history. The greatest thinkers of the 19th century—Kant, Locke, Hobbes, Rousseau, Montesquieu, and Mill—agreed that natural law properly authorizes the sovereign to take life in order to vindicate justice. Only Jeremy Bentham was ambivalent. Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin endorsed it. Abraham Lincoln authorized executions for deserters in wartime. Alexis de Tocqueville, who expressed profound respect for American institutions, believed that the death penalty was indispensable to the support of social order.

Mayor Koch also dismisses charges that racial discrimination takes place in the assessment of capital punishment.

The appeals process for a condemned prisoner is lengthy and painstaking. Every effort is made to see that the verdict and sentence were fairly arrived at. However, assertions of discrimination are not an argument for ending the death penalty but for extending it. It is not justice to exclude everyone from the penalty of the law if a few are found to be so favored. Justice requires that the law to be applied equally to all.

Recently, the Washington Legal Foundation prepared a position paper entitled "Capital Punishment 1986: Last Lines of Defense." The paper addressed itself to several topics, among which was the issue of race discrimination in capital punishment. The paper cited a Department of Justice report which indicated that, in fact, the death penalty has been meted out more readily to white defendants. While 12 out of every 1,000 blacks convicted of murder or manslaughter were sentenced to death, 16 out of every 1,000 whites were given the death penalty; 1.1 percent of black inmates on death row were executed; 1.7 percent of white death row inmates were executed. Finally, court rulings released a larger percentage of black death row inmates (37 percent) than of white (35 percent).

Now, to many of the blacks who are victimized in the inner city—and they are victimized by murderers to a far greater extent than people who live in the suburbs and of the majority population in this country, I do not think that is very comforting.

In fact, to them, this whole argument about discrimination is moot. They are being killed at an unbelievable rate in this country. The leading cause of death to black men between ages 18 and 24 in the United States today is not to cancer, is not to heart disease, it is to murder.

It seems to me we owe consideration of this to members of the minority community as well as other citizens.

As for the comparison with other democracies, Koch comments:

No other major democracy—in fact, few other countries of any description—are plagued by a murder rate such as that in the United States. Fewer and fewer Americans can remember the days when unlocked doors were the norm and murder was a rare and terrible offense. In America the murder rate climbed 122 percent between 1963 and 1980. During the same period, the murder rate in New York City increased by almost 400 percent, and the statistics are even worse in many other cities. A study at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology showed that based on 1970 homicide rates a person who lived in a large American city ran a greater risk of being murdered than an American soldier in World War II ran of being killed in combat. It is not surprising that the laws of each country differ according to differing conditions and traditions. If other countries had our murder problem, the cry for capital punishment would be just as loud as it is here. And I daresay that any other democracy where 75 percent of the people supported the death penalty would soon enact it into law.

Mr. Speaker, Mayor Koch is exactly right. It is no wonder that many Americans feel frustrated about law enforcement. When they know that the death penalty can deter criminals, when they know that it can make the streets of our cities safer, and when they know it can provide just sanctions against the spies and terrorists who threaten the foundations of our society, and yet the Congress remains silent, who can blame them for losing faith in our criminal justice system? Let us consider the lives and even freedoms that may be lost as a result of continued inaction. Let us consider the effect of continued ignorance of the popular will on the compact that exists between the Government and the governed. When we do so, it becomes clear that capital punishment legislation is not merely important, but urgent. We must enact it, and we must enact it in 1986.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN] has taken out a special order on this very important subject, and I take great pleasure in joining him in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, currently, the death penalty is already available under a limited number of provisions in Federal law.

Opponents to capital punishment contend that it fails to serve as a viable deterrent to criminal activity and that it constitutes cruel and unusual punishment for those convicted of certain offenses.

As we examine a criminal justice system that breeds repeat offenders and that makes it a practice to afford shorter periods of actual hard time for convicts, Congress must act in order to effectively reduce crimes against the person.

The only reason capital punishment is not the deterrent it can be is because of the knowledge that it takes extended periods of time to review a death sentence in the court system. The time, effort and money that is expended during this process makes it less likely to be pursued except in rare cases. The only effective deterrence is swift and certain punishment upon conviction. Antisocial behavior resulting in the death of innocent victims needs to be severely dealt with. By its very design, our penal system is set up to rehabilitate and not deter. Capital punishment legislation fills this void.

I ask my colleagues to consider the following: What obligation does society have to feed, clothe, house, educate, job train and provide medical care to repeat convicted felons who have raped, murdered and robbed and ravaged their fellow citizens? We take better care of our criminal population than we do the victims of their activity. Is that logical? Is it morally responsive? I think not.

The argument that capital punishment is cruel and unusual never ceases to amaze me. I maintain that incarceration for extended periods of time—15, 25, 35 years—is a fate worse than death. Opponents of this legislation fool themselves by thinking that caging up human beings for life is somehow more humane than capital punishment. We live and thrive on our freedom, and without it we perish.

Punishment must fit the crime if deterrence is to be achieved. I ask my colleagues to support capital punishment legislation. The choice is one between more victims, more social ills, more prisons, increased costs of safer streets and neighborhoods.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for his comments, and I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in this special order in the House on the need for action on capital punishment legislation. As a former trial attorney, I have seen firsthand the deterrent effect that the death penalty can have. And as you know, a recent Gallup poll shows that 72 percent of the American public favors the death penalty for persons convicted of murder. We have seen the effects of a society without it—violent and senseless criminal acts and a dramatic and threatening increase in espionage-related activities. These crimes must be deterred or punished by a death penalty statute.

We in thg Congress have a special duty to show support for the imposition of the death penalty in certain cases and to affirm one of our Nation's basic beliefs that society's primary responsibility is to protect its members so they might live in safety. The American public wants the Congress to pass a death penalty statue and I believe it's time for us to take action.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank you for your comments.

I would like to conclude by saying, just give us a chance, Mr. Speaker, and the leadership of the House, to deal with this issue. That is all we ask; that is all the American people ask.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1017. An act to provide for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports to an independent airport authority; and

S. Con. Res. 128. Concurrent resolution to commemorate the bicentennial of Australia and to honor the April 1986 visit of Australian Prime Minister Robert Hawke to the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order precede the special order of the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

RECOGNIZING THE FRIENDSHIP AND ASSISTANCE OF THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, during times of difficulty and trial, nations as well as individuals learn who their friends are and those upon whom you can count.

In the recent episode regarding Libya, regarding the need to put an end to the terrorist formentation in Libya, the United States sought cooperation, help and assistance from our European allies.

Today I am introducing a resolution to express the gratitude of the American people for the assistance provided by the Government and by the people of the United Kingdom during our defensive operations carried out against Libya on April 14.

Mr. Speaker, I am also troubled that other allies, given the opportunity to assist us, such as allowing our fighter bombers to overfly their territory were not as cooperative.

In this resolution I am introducing, I state that there is a rising tide of State-sponsored international terrorism and that this constitutes a direct threat to the security of our country as well as to our European allies, and that the American and European civilians and military personnel have been victims of these terrorist acts that have been directed by the Government and individuals in Libya, and that our Government is possessed of hard evidence that further Libyan-planned and supported terrorist acts against American nations and our installations are emminent, and that, Mr. Speaker, under article 51 of the U.N. Charter, which unequivocally sanctions the use of military force in self-defense, that we did take these acts on April 14.

Then on that day, the naval and air forces of our country did conduct defensive operations against Libya, and that the Government of the United Kingdom did allow, at the request of the United States, the U.S. Air Force FB-111s, fighter bombers, stationed in Great Britain, to be used against the Libyans to put an end to this terrorist situation.

Mr. Speaker, my resolution today states that we as a people in the United States are deeply grateful to the Government and the people of the United Kingdom who assisted us in our trial and need and also that this resolution, House resolution, once it passes, be delivered to the Ambassador of Great Britain, here in Washington, DC.

It is this that I wish to commend a friend and ally through the years; they stood with us.

I am proud of the people of Great Britain, I am proud of their friendship, I commend them for standing fast.

The resolution follows:

H.J. RES. —

A resolution to express the gratitude of the American people for the assistance provided by the government and people of the United Kingdom during defensive operations carried out against Libya on April 14, 1986

Whereas the rising tide of state-sponsored international terrorism constitutes a direct threat to the security of the United States and its European allies; and

Whereas American and European civilians and military personnel have recently been victims of terrorist acts directed by the government of Libya; and

Whereas the government of the United States possessed incontrovertible evidence that further Libyan-planned and supported terrorist acts against American nationals and installations were imminent; and

Whereas Article 51 of the United Nations Charter unequivocally sanctions the use of military force in self-defense, collectively as well as by individual members; and

Whereas on April 14, 1986, naval and air forces of the United States conducted defensive operations against Libyan military bases and terrorists training facilities in order to prevent those imminent terrorist attacks; and

Whereas the government of the United States sought the permission of the government of the United Kingdom to allow U.S. Air Force F-111 bombers stationed in Great Britain to participate in those defensive operations; and

Whereas the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom granted that permission; and

Whereas the use of the F-111 bombers substantially reduced the risk to American servicemen and significantly contributed to the success of their mission; and

Whereas such exemplary cooperation as that extended by the government of the United Kingdom in this instance is necessary to effectively combat terrorism: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives—

(1) on behalf of the people of the United States expresses gratitude to the government and people of the United Kingdom who resolutely assisted the United States in the legitimate exercise of self-defense and the fight against state-sponsored international terrorism; and

(2) directs the Clerk of the House to transmit a copy of this resolution to the United Kingdom's ambassador to the United States.

ELDERLY HOUSING PROGRAM UNDER SECTION 202 HIGHLIGHTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. BOGGS. I thank the Speaker so much.

As the House of Representatives prepares to consider the supplemental appropriations bill and the disapproval of a number of proposed deferrals, many related to housing assistance for low- and moderate-income Americans, I thought it a most appropriate time to call our colleagues' attention to the very real success story of HUD's Section 202 Loan Program, which assists nonprofit organizations or sponsors in providing housing for the elderly and handicapped who are of low or moderate income.

I am deeply concerned that the administration has requested rescission of funds for the Section 202 Program in fiscal year 1986 and has requested no funds for the program in fiscal year 1987. Along with many of our colleagues, I continue to subscribe to the goal, first expressed in the Housing Act of 1949, of decent, safe and sanitary housing for all Americans. Good quality, affordable housing for our growing elderly population is in short supply, yet the kind of housing provided through the Section 202 Program has often been found to help the elderly live independent lives, avoiding the need for confinement in nursing homes.

There are many 202 projects throughout the Nation that deserve our praise. I should especially like to compliment the initiative and leadership of the archdiocese of New Orleans in making use of the Section 202 Program to provide fine housing for over 1,800 elderly and handicapped area residents. The kinds of projects developed in the New Orleans area and operated by the Sisters of the Holy Family and other religious orders and nonprofit organizations offer inspiring examples of the great gains that can be made with a little Federal help and encouragement.

I would like to share with you some excerpts from an article which appeared in the March 8, 1986 issue of America Magazine written by Joseph H. Fichter, S.J., a sociologist at Loyola University in New Orleans. Father Fichter tells the story of the successful archdiocesan effort to provide housing for the elderly and handicapped in the New Orleans area through the Section 202 Program. He highlights a residential community known as St. John Berchmans Manor, operated by the Sisters of the Holy Family.

In addition, I would like to share with our colleagues a letter to the editor of America submitted by our esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] chairman of the Banking Committee's Housing Subcommittee. Chairman GONZALEZ notes the many accomplishments of the Section 202 Program and urges that we as a nation make certain that we can provide more St. John Berchmans Manors for Americans. I certainly share his views.

St. John Berchmans Manor in New Orleans, La., is a high-rise, 150-unit residence for elderly persons of low income, built with a Department of Housing and Urban Development (H.U.D.) loan and managed by the sisters of the Holy Family. The tenants must be at least 62 years of age and have an annual income of no more than $9,650. The sisters have been approved for another 40-year Federal H.U.D. loan, this time to build a 50-unit high-rise next door to their Lafon Nursing Home. All plans and blueprints have been completed, but the specific allocation of funds has been delayed. The proportion of needy elderly is increasing in the New Orleans population, while the Federal commitment to such housing appears to be gradually eroding.

The 1971 White House Conference on Aging had recommended the construction of 120,000 units of housing for the elderly annually. In no single year since then has Congress appropriated sufficient funds to provide more than 30,000 such housing units. In 1984, the Federal Government approved only 12,000 units of Section 202 housing for the elderly. For 1986, the allocations across the country are for only 14,000 units of elderly housing, but there was included on the agenda of the Appropriations Committee an item to freeze all section 202 allocations. While the need is immense and growing, the Federal retrenchment of funds for elderly housing is exacerbating the problem. Nevertheless, the long-term loans and rental subsidies from H.U.D. made possible 10 archdiocesan housing projects providing 1,835 apartments for the elderly poor and handicapped in the New Orleans area. The Archdiocese now boasts one of the largest privately sponsored housing programs in the United States.

The sisters undertook this venture into congregate housing for the elderly poor at the inspiration of Archbishop Philip M. Hannan, who was alerted to the shortage of housing from his first days in New Orleans. On his arrival in 1965, he was greeted with the devastation wrought by Hurricane Betsy, especially on the homes of the poor. He was met by Eugene McManus, S.S.J., a trained sociologist with long experience among the local black parishes, who urged application for Federal loans under Section 202 of the 1959 Housing Act. Father McManus, a member of the Mayor's Housing Committee and local chapter president of the Urban League, contacted Michael O'Keefe, William Guste, Clarence Jupiter, Louis Reed and others to organize Christopher Homes, Inc., a nonprofit corporation to develop housing for low-income people.

The residents of St. John Berchmans Manor are among the fortunate minority of low-income senior citizens able to obtain such housing accommodations. Sister Rose de Lima Hazeur, S.S.F., manager of the Manor, reports increasing numbers of frustrated applicants. St. John Berchmans Manor exemplifies the ingenuity and courage of the Holy Family Sisters who own and staff the facility that was built on land belonging to their religious community. All the other Federally financed projects under diocesan sponsorship were built on land acquired by the Archbishop for this purpose. Assuming the administration of these housing complexes constituted a new and additional apostolate for the religious sisters of six different communities.

The residents of St. John Berchmans Manor are among the fortunate minority of low-income senior citizens able to obtain such affordable housing accommodations. They are the envy of thousands of similarly qualified "outsiders" looking for similar housing that simply does not exist.

There are positive benefits that accrue beyond the routine of moving into safe, comfortable, affordable living quarters. James Broder points out that such nonprofit housing for the elderly can increase healthy lifespans. He states: "Because of social involvement, emotional and physical security, and the services that can be provided, people occupying such housing tend not to deteriorate in many of the ways associated with aging. Residents of such housing tend to live more active, healthier lives and require less institutionalization."

The promotion of this expanding social ministry may provide apostolic opportunities for other Catholic dioceses and religious communities.

In response to this splendid article, Mr. GONZALEZ wrote the following letter to the editor of America.

CONGRESSIONAL VOICE FOR THE POOR

I wish to commend Father Joseph H. Fichter, S.J., and AMERICA for presenting in his fine article "Shelter for the Elderly Poor" (2/1) the story of a very successful housing project sponsored by the Archdiocese of New Orleans, assisted by the Federal Government and managed by the Sisters of the Holy Family.

Under the President's budget submitted to the Congress this week, funds Congress already appropriated for the Section 202 elderly-housing program are proposed to be rescinded, and no funds would be made available in F.Y. 1987. In October 1984, just a month before the November elections, President Reagan presided over the opening of a Section 202 project in Buffalo, N.Y., sponsored by the Diocese of Buffalo and managed by a religious community in a way similar to that of the St. John Berchmans Manor project.

The Administration sought to end the Section 202 program last January but was unable to convince the Congress. Again this year we are being confronted, under the budget-cutting mania brought upon us by the Gramm-Rudman Act, with proposals to terminate all of the Federal Government's efforts to provide housing for low- and moderate-income people.

Those of us in Congress who support this 50-year commitment on the part of the Federal Government to provide decent, safe and suitable housing for our low- and moderate-income people have been fighting a lonely and essentially rear-guard battle against a popular President who dismisses the Section 202 elderly and all of our housing programs as not being part of the Government's responsibility. The Subcommittee on Housing and Community Development has heard testimony throughout the country on the success of other Federally assisted housing projects and has heard testimony from members of church-related groups, including that of Cardinal John O'Connor of New York City, that have cleverly and industriously found ways to assist low-income people, albeit in very small increments. Unfortunately, too little of this effort has been brought forth in the public media. Whether this is a reflection of the fact that housing for our citizens is no longer a priority on the social agenda of our country or that the media have been more enamored with the issues that the President has presented is difficult for me to determine.

If the President's agenda is adopted by the Congress and the American people, there will be no additional units of low-income housing for the growing number of poor families and no further commitment by the Federal Government to housing as an essential element in the traditional values of family life in our country.

If the church communities do not speak out loudly in protest of this direction of policy, then no one will. We will have submitted to the propaganda that Federally assisted low-income housing has been a failure. But it has not failed, as Father Fichter has demonstrated in his article. There are hundreds of such projects throughout this country.

I believe that we could strengthen and enhance the viability of Federally assisted low-income housing by having more St. John Berchmans Manors where church-related groups are working together in a supportive role with low-income tenants in managing and operating projects, providing various counseling services and encouraging the political support necessary to continue the Federal Government's financial commitment to low-income people in need of housing.

Mr. HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
U.S. House of Representatives.
WASHINGTON, DC.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes ahead of any special orders heretofore granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CREDIT LIMITS FROM GNMA AND FHA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WYLIE. I thank the Speaker.

I take this time to respond to an inquiry from many of my colleagues as to what we are doing about the credit limits for Ginnie Mae and FHA. I have had calls from mortgage lenders, home builders, and realtors, too.

May I say to the gentlewomen from Louisiana who just preceded me in the well that the section 202 elderly housing program is healthy and is here to stay, and I would not have too much apprehension about it.

But I would like to say that yesterday I introduced legislation along with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking, Mr. ST GERMAIN, and the distinguished chairman of the Housing Subcommittee, Mr. GONZALEZ, and the distinguished ranking minority member of the Housing Subcommittee, Mr. MCKINNEY.

The bill to which I refer is H.R. 4602, the FHA/GNMA Credit Assistance Act of 1986.

This is a measure which is critical to the Nation's home buyers. Last week we were advised that the Federal Government had reached the legal limit on the amount of mortgages it can guarantee in this fiscal year. The Government National Mortgage Association, which is popularly known as Ginnie Mae, has a statutorily established credit limit of $65.3 billion.

Ginnie Mae acts as a secondary mortgage market for FHA and VA loans by guaranteeing securities backed by privately issued mortgages which are underwritten by the Federal Government. Through its Mortgage-Backed Securities Program, Ginnie Mae channels funds from the Nation's securities markets into the housing market.

Ginnie Mae's Mortgage Backed Securities Program has not only increased the overall supply of mortgage credit for housing, but has accomplished this while at the same time assuring that credit is available at reasonable rates.

Due to the unprecedented heavy activity in FHA home mortgages, it is clear the FHA credit limit will soon be depleted for this fiscal year also.

Since the latter part of 1984, the housing industry has experienced a spectacular and unprecedented surge in home sales activity. This substantial increase in housing sales has been largely attributable to a steady decline in long-term interest rates. As long-term interest rates have declined, home ownership opportunities have increased dramatically. For example, since the fourth quarter of calendar year 1984—when the current surge began—interest rates have dropped by approximately 3.5 percent and now are under 10 percent for the first time in almost 8 years. At these current low rates, the number of households which would qualify to purchase the median priced home has increased by approximately 8.1 million. The success of this administration's efforts to foster a healthy rate of economic growth with reduced rates of unemployment and a largely inflation free environment is clearly in evidence in the housing sector of the American economy.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development reports that single-family unit applications at the end of February totaled 547,740 and are double last year's activity for the comparable period. At the current pace, HUD conservatively estimates that single-family unit applications could exceed 1.5 million compared with the 1986 budget projections for 900,000 units. These statistics are staggering and are a tribute to the economic recovery in the housing industry. It now appears virtually certain that, short of a dramatic rise in interest rates, demand for FHA mortgage insurance this year will be the highest in the FHA's 52-year existence.

In view of this unprecedented demand for home credit, our legislation would increase the limitation of the amount of FHA commitments to insure mortgages and loans from $57.4 billion up to $95 billion. Also, the limitation on commitments to guarantee Ginnie Mae mortgage-backed securities would be increased from $65.3 billion up to $100 billion.

I believe it is important to remind my colleagues that these figures represent credit limits and are not disbursements from the U.S. Treasury.

It is important to note that the Federal Housing Insurance Funds are on an actuarially sound footing. In fact, I should emphasize that the increased applications for mortgage insurance during this fiscal year can be expected to generate an estimated $948 million in additional receipts in 1986 and 1987 from prepaid premiums collection.

Mr. ST GERMAIN, Mr. GONZALEZ, and Mr. MCKINNEY and I have sent around a "Dear Colleague" letter. I hope that Members of the House will join us in acting immediately on this legislation. There are thousands of would-be homeowners who have waited for interest rates to fall to a level that would allow them to fulfill their dream of an affordable home. With FHA insurance, that is possible now; without FHA insurance, it may not be possible.

Mr. Speaker, the dollar limits set forth in H.R. 4602 legislation are based on data provided by HUD as of the end of March. I firmly believe we must act now and correct this rapidly escalating problem.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WYLIE. I would be glad to yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for bringing forth the legislation in a very timely fashion to assure all the people who have such concern and worry that they will indeed have their difficulties taken care of.

I also wish to commend the gentleman for standing stalwartly behind the 202 Program. I had the pleasure of serving with the gentleman in the well in the Banking Currency Committee and the Housing Subcommittee before I went over to the sister Committee on Appropriations, and I have always found the gentleman to be one of the stalwarts in support of housing for all of the American people, clean, safe, decent, and affordable housing.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for that compliment and for her contribution. It was indeed a pleasure to serve with the gentlewoman on the Banking Committee. The gentlewoman did perform a distinguished service.

What I meant to do when I got up here, and I do appreciate the statements the gentlewoman made with reference to the elderly 202 Housing Program, it has been a good program. It has served its purpose well. I want the gentlewoman to know of my commitment to continue the 202 Elderly Housing Program. I think that there is little reason for apprehension, that it will be continued at least through this fiscal year and into the next.

I do hope the gentlewoman will sign on the bill which we introduced today.

THERE YOU GO AGAIN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, "There you go again" is the title of this particular special order. I want to use that phrase to refer to what I think are three very different problems that affect us here in the U.S. House of Representatives and that we need to look at as they relate to the American people and where we are at today.

Many Americans will remember that "There you go again" was the phrase that then candidate Ronald Reagan used in his debates with President Jimmy Carter when President Carter would exaggerate a particular position or would state about Ronald Reagan's position things that then Governor Reagan thought were not accurate. The way he would respond is by saying, "There you go again."

I gave a special order, I guess, 2 weeks ago, a 5-minute special order about the way in which the House had suddenly been adjourned one night, the reasons that were given for that adjournment. And I wish at the time I had thought of saying, "There you go again," because it just was not, in my judgment, an accurate statement of what happened.

Today we had a debate where I think the Republican Party communicated as decisively as it could how deeply upset it is, how deeply offended it is, by the way in which the Democratic leadership structured this particular opportunity to vote on aid to the freedom fighters.

While I am going to talk some about the Democratic leaders of the House, I want to make clear that on a number of these problems, it is not purely a partisan disagreement. I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] was right today when he said that we face a bipartisan problem on the issue of how we defend freedom and how we deal with the transnational strategies of the Soviet empire attempting to extend tyranny.

Clearly there are some Republicans who would vote against aid to the freedom fighters. There are many courageous Democrats who spoke and worked and argued for and voted for aid to the freedom fighters. It is not purely a partisan issue, but it becomes an issue of the Democratic leadership, because the Democratic leadership runs the House. It sets the rules. It decides on the committee structures. It ultimately decides on the calendar. In effect, it makes up the rules of the game.

When every Republican but one voted today for the Hamilton-Barnes amendment, something we would not normally have expected, they did so because their leader, BOB MICHEL, had told them it was the only strategy he could see to get across the message that we as a party were fundamentally offended by the way the House is being run, that we thought it was fundamentally unfair, and that we thought it was not fair to the American people, it was not fair to the minority party, it was not fair to the major issue of freedom in Central America.

But it goes deeper than just today's vote, just this situation.

There was something wrong a couple of weeks ago when we brought a major bill about gun control to the floor of the House only by having signed a discharge petition, only by having 218 Members walk up right here and sign their name to bring that bill out, because the committee chairman and the Democratic leadership would not bring it to the floor.

Now we find ourselves in a similar situation. Congressman MICHEL and Congressman LOTT have filed a rule which would bring a bill to the floor.

Next week they will file a discharge petition to bring that rule up. It is a cumbersome, clumsy, inadequate process, but it is the only way allowed to us to have a clean, straight vote on helping the freedom fighters so that that vote, if it passes, can send a bill across to the Senate, to the other body, so that it can then go to the President.

What was being tried today by the Democratic leadership was just plain wrong. It was an effort to say that even if we could find the votes on the floor to pass aid to the freedom fighters, all those votes would do would put that proposal on a supplemental appropriations bill which, at best, would take several months to go through the other body and through conference and to final passage and, at worst, would actually be vetoed by the President, therefore going nowhere. In other words, the liberal Democratic leadership had set up a game in which, even, when those of us who favor help to the freedom fighters won, we would lose, by in effect blowing up that game, by voting for Barnes-Hamilton, in order to force the Democratic leadership to recognize that it could not possibly win on final passage.

Those of us who favor aid to the freedom fighters were trying to say, "Enough is enough. Let's look at things fairly."

This is a constant, recurring problem. We find again and again that rules are made to suit the liberal Democratic leadership, rules are changed to suit the liberal Democratic leadership, things are written as the liberal Democratic leadership wants them to be.

We were told today, for example, that it would have been impossible to have introduced a free-standing bill and brought it up in the time allotted. "There you go again" is probably the correct answer, because the fact is we could introduce a bill this evening and if the Speaker wanted to instruct the Rules Committee to bring it out, they could meet tomorrow and we could be voting on that bill by Monday. In fact, if we wanted to bring the bill to the House—and this has happened in my experience here—if the House would vote by a large enough majority, I believe it is two-thirds, we could actually go to the Rules Committee in the morning and report that bill out by tomorrow afternoon.

It is simply not correct to say, as some Members of the liberal Democratic leadership said today, that they were technically stopped. And, in fact, members of the liberal Democratic leadership have been quite candid in the past that they could bring up bills when they wanted to, they could basically set the calendar as they wanted to, that they are the majority and they have the right to run this place the way they want to.

So they set up the game today so that the side that favored helping the freedom fighters could not win. And then, when they found they had outsmarted themselves, they tried to explain it was not their fault.

We face a similar problem on the budget. Under Gramm-Rudman, we should have passed a budget I believe it was yesterday. Under Gramm-Rudman we should have done our job. I have been told today—and this is hearsay because I have only talked to one Republican member of the Budget Committee—but that member told me they have not had an official meeting of the Budget Committee since March 13.

Surely, one would wonder why we are not following the law, why we are not in fact passing a budget when we are supposed to.

The problem is, from the standpoint of liberalism in America, that both in foreign policy and defense policy, on the one hand, and on domestic policy and the budget, on the other hand, there are no good answers if you are a liberal.

Consider, for example, the relationship between Qadhafi, the Libyan terrorist leader, and Nicaraguan communism. The fact is that Qadhafi and Libya have given $400 million in economic aid to Nicaraguan Communists. The fact is that the Libyan Government has sent over 100 military advisers to the Nicaraguan Communist Government. The fact is that the Libyan Government sent 2 helicopters to the Nicaraguan Communists. The fact is that the Libyan terrorists sent antiaircraft machineguns to the Nicaraguan Communists. The fact is that the Libyans sent SA-7 shoulder-fired rockets to the Nicaraguan Communists. The fact is the Libyan terrorists sent small arms and ammunition to the Nicaraguan Communists. The fact is that there were 4 planeloads of Libyan weapons that landed in Brazil labeled as medical supplies but that in fact turned out to have 2 dismantled fighter planes, 600 light rockets and literally tons of weapons for the Nicaraguan Communists.

Now, none of these facts are in dispute. Yet as recently as yesterday, one member of the liberal Democratic leadership told the press that he just did not believe that the Libyans had done anything like that.

Now, that poses, I think, a real problem for the American people at two levels. In the first place, liberal foreign policy would make great sense if we lived in Epcot Center or Disney World, if there was a fantasyland of nice people in which there was no violence. The problem with liberal Democratic foreign policy is that we live in a real world where there are people like Qadhafi and Ortega, where terrorists and Communists dine together, where there are active enemies of America.

Faced with that reality, liberal Democrats all too often rush into fantasyland and then are shocked when the fantasyland blows up in their face.

For example, when the United States, led by President Reagan, decided that enough Americans had been killed, that we had proof, for example, that Sgt. Kenneth T. Ford of Detroit, an infantry sergeant, 21 years old, had been killed by Libyans, when we knew that the National Security Agency had intercepted the radio messages and had interpreted them, the United States decided to retaliate.

When we decided to retaliate, we asked France for permission to fly over its territory. Yesterday France declined that permission.

I stood on the floor of the House and I listened as several liberals got up and said, "Oh, this is terrible of the French. How could they deny us flying over their territory?"

One of the reactions of liberalism, when suddenly its fantasyland is invaded by reality, is to blame somebody else. There is always somebody else who is responsible.

And it suddenly hit me: If you were France and you had watched the U.S. House of Representatives over the years and you had watched America leave Vietnam and you had watched American leave Cambodia and you had watched America leave Laos and you had watched America cut off aid to Angola and Mozambique, with the effect that the Soviet Empire and the Communist Cuban colonial moved in, and you had watched America be ineffective in Afghanistan and you had looked at the debate after debate in the U.S. House of Representatives, in which the American left again and again was against doing anything militarily effective, how big a gamble would you want to take?

And I was struck by an article in the Washington Times, an article about precisely that phenomena, an article which quoted Hondurans, entitled, "Contra 'Ghost' Materializes as Honduras Mentions Rebels."

Let me read a couple of paragraphs about why the Hondurans have been very, very careful about talking openly about their support for the Contras:

"It's still very difficult for us," the official said. "If we say the Contras are here, we will be in trouble with the international community and international law. We remember exactly what happened with Cambodia."

"What happened with Cambodia?" you might ask.

Well, there was a government of Cambodia that was pro-American, that was trying to stop the Communists, that was openly for us. And in the House of Representatives, we cut off aid to that government, and a few weeks later it fell and the horrors of Cambodia began, and the Communists killed over 1 million people.

The official goes on:

The official also noted that if Honduras gave a public blessing to the rebels, "then we are exposed to the revenge of the Sandinistas openly." And, he added, the Honduran government cannot be certain that American policy won't suddenly shift and leave Hondurans dangling on a branch.

This week's vote in Congress on U.S. aid to the rebels, for instance, has Hondurans deeply worried.

And I think every American should listen carefully to this next statement:

"It's hard to be a close friend or ally of the United States," the official said. "With the Soviet Union they have no strings attached to their aid. They have no Congress to satisfy . . . . But with the United States, you have to get—to give permission for everything. Mr. Reagan has good intentions, but he doesn't have the ability to act by himself . . . .

And he cited two liberal Democrats—

"But we have to live with the consequences. Many people don't have sympathy for the United States. They can't say publicly to the United States. 'We hate you.' But they can say it to Honduras. It is very easy to make accusations against Honduras."

In other words, if you were a government in Central America, how much would you trust the U.S. Congress? If you were a government in Europe and you knew Ronald Reagan was firm or you read the debate in the U.S. Congress, how much would you risk on trusting the United States?

Let me give you some quotes. I went back and studied the debate in March on Nicaragua. I am not going to quote anybody by name. These are all liberals. All but one are Democrats. But I want you to listen to these quotes and ask yourselves if you were in Belgium or France or Italy and you had seen elected officials in the United States taking these positions, how ready would you be to get involved?

"All the guns in the world cannot win."

"There is no military solution. There is no military answer."

"War is an anachronism."

"National reconciliation is ordered by diplomacy, not by guns."

"I am concerned about us. Do we believe that the ways we should try to settle arguments is to grab our guns?

Does it matter whether we grab guns or whether we try to settle our problems?"

"The notion that our only option is war betrays a lack of imagination and an absence of confidence in our country's moral, economic, political and cultural strength."

Now, my point is, if you were a European country and you were asking, "Well, why are the Americans mad at Qadhafi? He is a lot further away than Nicaragua. Why are they picking on him? He has not killed more Americans than the Nicaraguan-supported El Salvadoran guerrillas have. Why are they picking on him? Why not negotiate? Why not sit down?"

Now, you and I may understand that in fact there comes a time when you have warned a person who is willing to use terrorism, when you have told him again and again not to do it, when you have absolute proof that he is deliberately killing Americans, there comes a time when you use force. But are we really prepared to be all that angry at our European allies when they have watched the last 15 years of vacillation and confusion and uncertainty in our system? Are we really all that prepared to say to the Hondurans, "Oh, you ought to stand up and be counted because you can really trust us, we won't leave"? I am not so sure.

And let me cite one personal example. In 1977, I visited with one of the senior leaders of the West German Army. At that time we had just moved a brigade up near Bremerhaven, on the German coast, in order to reinforce the northern flank of the central front. The way it had been presented to the news media came off very badly, and it looked as though we were trying to take a port so that we could protect ourselves.

And the German general said, "You know, it looked to many people"—this, remember, is 2 years after we had pulled out of Vietnam, pulled out of Laos, pulled out of Cambodia, it was 2 years after we had cut off aid in Angola and in Mozambique in order to have a negotiated settlement, followed immediately by 35,000 Cubans being flown in by the Soviets. The German general said to me, "It looks as though you're trying to protect a port of evacuation."

I, being naive, said, "You mean like Dunkirk?"

He said with a withering look, "No, I mean like Saigon."

Faced with that history and faced with unreliability of this Congress, would you really recommend to the Hondurans or the French to gamble on the American card that we are reliable and we are stable. And as you listened to the debate yesterday and today, would you really say that American liberalism has learned anything about the Soviet empire, the dangers of military force, or the nature of dictatorships? I am not so sure.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN].

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to clear up something that I was confused about in listening to the gentleman just a moment ago. He seemed to wonder whether we should not be doing the same thing to Nicaragua that we are doing to Libya, at least that is what I seemed to get from the parallel he was trying to draw between Libya and Nicaragua. I happen to believe that the President had no choice the other day. I think the evidence of Libyan terrorism was incontrovertible from all that I know, and he did the right thing. I have said that I support the President in the air attack on Libya, and I hope that we can convince Qadhafi and others that they are victims of their own grotesque terrorist acts in the long run.

Notwithstanding that, I assume the gentleman also supports the President in what he has done in Libya. Is he suggesting that there is a parallel with respect to Nicaragua and that we ought to be launching air attacks in Nicaragua, and the absence of doing that is what is confusing our European allies?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, I am suggesting we must have the willingness to be sophisticated about the nature of our enemies, and the willingness to recognize that our enemies are linked together, and the willingness to take the most effective steps currently available. There is, for example, in Libya, no active anti-Qadhafi domestic effort that we could be supporting. Frankly, if tomorrow morning there was a Libyan freedom movement that emerged and that was willing to tackle Qadhafi, I would be in favor of supporting it.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Is it a Communist monolith that we are concerned about here, and if so, how do we deal with the People's Republic of China?

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman asks exactly the right question. There is a Soviet empire. It is not purely ideological.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. It is not necessarily just Leninist-Marxist, it is Soviet as opposed to Leninist-Marxist?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the primary intellectual doctrine is Leninism. Marx is essentially, I think, irrelevant in terms of power. Marxism is a 19th century intellectual analysis, but I do not think that it relates much to this. I do think there is, if you will, a Soviet empire which believes at least as much in Leninism as we believe in the Constitution. I think that it is the nature of that Soviet empire that should frighten most Americans.

I happen to see Nicaragua in the context of the Soviet empire. I think Nicaragua in isolation is a nonissue. It is by definition not a threat to America. But Nicaragua as an additional building block in which the Soviet empire uses Communist Cuban colonial troops and establishes an additional set of bases and an additional set of resources, I think that is something legitimately that Americans can worry about and should worry about.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I do not disagree with the gentleman that certainly we need to worry about the Soviet bloc and the Soviet sphere of influence, and we need to be concerned about the Soviets in this hemisphere; we share that common concern.

One of the things that I was most interested in was that I feel the gentleman is being too kind to our allies in seeming to make excuses for them for not being supportive of our efforts to attempt to deal with Qadhafi. My feeling is that given the evidence that we have of Quadhafi's reign of terror around this world—a reign of terror, incidentally, which has substantial impact on Western Europe as well—it seems to me that it would be incumbent upon our allies in Europe to be very supportive of this country's efforts to deal with Qadhafi.

Frankly, I am very disappointed and also somewhat angry that some of those who we should count on as strong supporters in this instance seem not to be supportive at all. The gentleman knows what we are spending for 300,000 troops in Europe.

Mr. GINGRICH. Sure. I wish, I could say to my good friend, that they were more supportive. But I found it ironic that yesterday some people who have given impassioned speeches against force were suddenly outraged that the French and the Belgians had listened to their speeches, that people in this Congress who had voted year after year after year not to oppose effectively the Soviet empire should suddenly, on our terms on the day we decide to do it, decide that the French have to do what we think is right.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I wonder if the failing here is not the gentleman's suggestion that the way to deal with the Soviet empire is always force. It seems to me that force——

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not say that.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But the gentleman is suggesting that those who have not previously supported the use of force are somehow inconsistent when they see an application for force that they believe is appropriate.

Mr. GINGRICH. What I am suggesting is, and I think the gentleman has raised a very legitimate point here, that if for 15 years the systematic lecture of the American left has been not to be too aggressively anti-Communist, not to be too militaristic, not to use force, then when we finally begin to turn and say, "Ah, here is a case where we should use force," it seems to me a bit much to now condemn the Belgians and the French for not having learned our lesson. This is particularly the case in the light of a situation where, as I just read into the Record, as recently as last month many of our good friends on the left were once again preaching what is in effect that force never works, violence is never good, the military never solves anything.

All I was saying was that if I were the French Ambassador reading the American left's speeches last month on Nicaragua, I would advise my government to be very careful about trusting this Congress to back Ronald Reagan for more than 96 hours.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I think it mischaracterizes the debate to suggest that it is just the American left. The gentleman has members of his own party who have consistently opposed the use of force.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is why I did not say "Democrat." There are Republicans who belong to the American left.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I think that is too simple an analogy. It seems to me the gentleman characterized those who do not agree with the use of force in Nicaragua as people who are unwilling to use force in any instance where this country is threatened.

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no, I did not say that. I never said that. What I said was, and I say it is a consistent pattern, we cut off aid in South Vietnam, and it fell. We cut off aid in Cambodia, and it fell. We pulled out, and Laos fell. We refused to support anybody in Angola and Mozambique, and the Soviets used Cubans to take over. We have been ineffective in Afghanistan. We are indecisive in Nicaragua. We failed in Lebanon. And we were very passive in Iran.

All I am saying is, if you have that 15-year history of American confusion behind you and you were a foreign government, you might be a little careful, and it is a bit much for some of our friends on the left to suddenly get angry at the French, because the French have been watching and reading the speeches of our friends on the left.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I think the gentleman is too charitable to our allies. Why be that charitable? Why not ask our allies and expect our allies to look at the solid evidence that exists with respect to the need to deal with Libya, and ask them to make their judgments on that basis. We are not dealing with history lessons here.

Mr. GINGRICH. If he would, I would like the gentleman to give me one example in the last 16 years where the U.S. Congress has consistently supported the use of force anywhere.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. In Nicaragua.

Mr. GINGRICH. We have not consistently supported the use of force.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Of course we have. How does the gentleman think Somoza left? This country supported the Sandinistas.

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no, we did not support the use of force there.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Did we support the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, or did we not?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, we withdrew recognition and aid from Somoza.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If the gentleman believes that, if he believes that that is all that happened with the withdrawal of Somoza, then I think——

Mr. GINGRICH. We never voted to give money to the guerrillas while they were in the field.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Aha! But did we not support the Sandinistas' revolutionary movement?

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman is not hearing me.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I am asking a question.

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes, there was a period that lasted less than a year when we helped evict Somoza and we helped get the Communists in.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. That is my point. My point is that Somoza was thrown out of Nicaragua, regardless of the merits.

Mr. GINGRICH. Right; it took less than a year.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. All right. When Somoza was thrown out of Nicaragua, in the end of that process, when the Sandinistas were marching on Managua, the question I am asking is, "Was this country a party to that removal of that government, which was removed incidentally through force?"

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes, we were, very indirectly and nonmilitarily.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. All right, and the gentleman has asked—and so I have answered the question—he has asked, "Have we been willing to use force around this Earth?" Of course we have, in selected instances.

Mr. GINGRICH. Wait a second.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The difference is that some people want to use force in every instance.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is not fair. Wait a second. The French, when asked by us to go into Lebanon, went into Lebanon. There were Frenchmen killed the very same day the U.S. marines were killed. But if you are sitting in France and you are right across the ocean from the Libyans, and you say to yourself, "All right, Ronald Reagan is mad this week, and this week Ronald Reagan is going to be able to launch an air strike. How long do I think the news media in America and the intellectual left in America and the politicians in America are going to let Ronald Reagan be that decisive?"

All I am saying is—and I am not apologizing for the French—I wish they had supported us.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. It sounds like the gentleman is.

Mr. GINGRICH. What I am saying is that I think that there is an awful lot in our behavior over the last 16 years that is—and I quoted a Honduran official talking to a Washington Times reporter yesterday about how scary it is to rely on the United States, knowing that this Congress at any moment can vote to cut and run.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Let me suggest this. I think if you are going to rely on anybody in this world, you ought to be able to rely on this country. The United States is the most reliable, bar none, in this world. You show me trouble in this world and I will show you who has gone there first with the most and generally speaking, it has been us.

Mr. GINGRICH. I can give five examples: Cambodia, Vietnam, Laos, Angola, and Mozambique.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. What did we first deliver to Cambodia?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no. What I am saying is we voted to pull out in each of those countries. We voted to allow a vacuum of power for the Soviets.

Now, all I am saying is that if you or anybody else in the world watching that, would that not scare you? Given what the gentleman just said, and I agree, if you love freedom, we are the best hope on this planet; but for the last 16 years we have been pretty scary.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Oh, see; I guess I do not share that view. I mean, I asked about Cambodia because I rue the day when we decided to chase into Cambodia and begin dropping the bombs there.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman does rue the day?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Yes, I do, because we began dropping those bombs in Cambodia illegally, incidentally, and I think there is a lot of evidence of that.

Mr. GINGRICH. Sure, because they had allowed the North Vietnamese in there illegally.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, the point is we went in seeking those bases with a substantial bombing of Cambodia, which eventually led to the horrors that we now have discovered about that country.

My point is this: In the last 15 years, which is a period in history where the gentleman feels we apparently have not used force enough——

Mr. GINGRICH. Where we have withdrawn and allowed the Soviet empire to win.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, but I think there is substantial evidence in this hemisphere and I think around the world that democracy in many respects is succeeding.

Let me give the gentleman some examples in this hemisphere. The gentleman knows the examples. We have a gem of a democracy in Costa Rica. We have a new democratic government in Honduras. We have a new democratic government in Guatemala.

It is interesting to me, moving from democracies to other parts of this world, that in the last 15 years we have opened up China, and I pay homage to Richard Nixon for doing that, without arms.

China somehow is now open to the West, and in fact becoming a friend of the West.

I was amazed the other day to discover that this administration wants to send them some military airplane technology on the heels of the nuclear power technology they also wanted to share with them, al la George Bush.

Mr. GINGRICH. I would say explicitly in the context that China discovered in the late fifties that it did not want to be a part of the Soviet empire and that for all practical purposes we are the allies of almost anybody who does not want to be part of the Soviet empire.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Oh, but part of the Vietnam experience and part of the judgment that went into that was that the Chinese and the Soviets represented a Communist monolith. Would the gentleman not agree with that? That was the assessment here in this country and in Washington, DC.

Mr. GINGRICH. No. I do not think that was true by 1963 or 1964. I think there was a general feeling that the fighting—remember, there was a very severe split in 1958-59 and by 1964, I think it was, there was actually fighting on the Sino-Soviet border.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, I guess everything I have read suggests——

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to get to the documents. I used to teach that stuff.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, I was not here in Washington, DC, at the time; but the documents are also available that I have read that suggest that the underpinnings of the Vietnam experience was a belief there was a monolith of communism between the Red Chinese and the Soviet Union.

But be that as it may, I guess the point where the gentleman and I part company is the gentleman's notion that somehow in the last 16 years we have become a weak sister internationally and that other countries should view us that way.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not say they should. I said do.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The gentleman said they do.

Mr. GINGRICH. I quoted a Honduran who said flatly he does. I quoted a West German who said that he was scared that we would pull a Saigon.

All I am sayng, there are reasonable grounds for other countries, particularly looking at this House of Representatives in the U.S. Congress, to be very confused and very uncertain about America's commitment to a firm, consistent, long-range policy.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, I do not think Hondurans should be confused at all. I mean, I think this country's commitment to Honduras, particularly in recent years, has been substantial. The people I have visited with in Tegucigalpa, Honduras, do not reflect the person the gentleman quoted from.

I guess the point I wanted to make is that I do not see the gentleman's rather dark view of where we have been and where we are going. I think we must use power responsibly. I think the gentleman would probably agree with me that we are probably the most powerful country in the world. I happen to feel that way.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think we are.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. And the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs would probably believe that. You know, one of the responsibilities of power is to know when to use it and to know when not to use it.

I think if we look over a continuum of time that this country has been doing pretty well. We can look back and see some mistakes and I would be willing to admit to those mistakes; but I would sooner err on the side that we have erred on perhaps than the other side.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think it depends in part, if you went back and took a snapshot of the world, certainly as late as 1959 and certainly maybe as late as 1966 or 1967, and you took a snapshot of the world today, let me cite the changes for just a second:

South Vietnam is now Communist. Laos is now Communist. Cambodia is now Communist, meaning there is a Soviet naval base in Camranh Bay.

Ethiopia is now Communist. South Yemen is now Communist, meaning that there are Soviet troops and Cuban troops there.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But the gentleman is not just concerned about Communists.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am talking about part of the Soviet empire.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The gentleman is saying that Ethiopia is now part of the Soviet empire.

Mr. GINGRICH. Sure.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. We want to distinguish between Communists and Communists.

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate the gentleman's point.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The administration's view with respect to China has been confused. I want to make that distinction.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman is exactly right, and I think frankly it is one of the reasons over the last 2 years, in trying to listen to the debate in the House that I have had to think through, what is it we failed to explain?

Let us talk about the Soviet empire and let us see the world for a minute from the standpoint of gaining and losing ground.

The Soviet empire, as I said, gained resources in South Vietnam, which is now part of the Vietnamese Communist government and the Soviet empire now has a big naval base a Camranh Bay.

The Soviet empire gained assets and facilities in Ethiopia and in South Yemen, using, interestingly enough, both Cuban and colonial troops and is now in a position where it is on both sides of the mouth of the Red Sea.

The Soviet empire gained considerable advantage in Angola and Mozambique, both of which have Cuban and colonial troops and has advantages there.

The Soviet empire was on the verge of gaining an air field in Grenada and when we liberated the island, they lost that.

The Soviet empire is in the process of gaining a Pacific port and a 10,000-foot runway and other facilities in Nicaragua by making it in effect a colony of the Soviet empire.

The Soviet empire has something like 11 air bases in Cuba, its largest spy station at Lourdes listening to us, and in the Cuban Navy has a set of assets about the size of Nazi Germany's submarines in World War II in the Caribbean.

All I am suggesting is not that we are in desperate straits, but first of all, that we are up against an active adversary in the Soviet empire that systematically seeks to extend tyranny, that has invented two kinds of conflicts that we are not used to yet.

One is what I would call transnational conflict, where they have the right to cheat, as the gentleman himself said about Cambodia. They get to cheat, but if we do anything that is wrong—and I would say again in Nicaragua we have at least as much evidence about Nicaraguan support of terrorists and guerrillas as we have about Qadhafi.

There is plenty of evidence, for example, about El Salvadoran Communists getting aid directly from Nicaragua. We have tons of evidence.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, that is not quite the case. We have had a secret session of the House and we have seen evidence from pictures.

Mr. GINGRICH. Would the gentleman seriously dispute factually whether or not there is a flow of weapons and other resources through Nicaragua into El Salvador?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. No; I would not dispute that. I am saying there may be some weapons flowing there.

The gentleman is saying there is a flood of weapons.

Mr. GINGRICH. OK. We can argue about flood.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The gentleman tells me if they send a few guns somewhere, that is a flood

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, what is a flood in most of North Dakota?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, let us talk about it for a second. The gentleman knows of the Gulf of Fonseca, which is the gulf around Honduras, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. On the Gulf of Fonseca we have provided money for the fast boats. These are the fast little boats with machine guns and you have got the Hondurans patrolling the Gulf of Fonseca, because the Gulf of Fonseca, frankly, is where there is supposed to be the major amount of a cache of guns being moved from Nicaragua to El Salvador.

I was on the Gulf of Fonseca. I went to the naval station that deals with these fast boats. We had a briefing from the colonel. Every colonel, of course, has a slide projector, so we saw the slide projector presentation first and heard how great the fast boats were and how they patrolled the Gulf of Fonseca for 18 months and how many more boats they have now than then and so forth.

Then I asked the operative question: How many guns have you interdicted here?

"Well, none."

"None, in 18 months?"

"Now we think we have stopped it."

The point is, I am not suggesting there are not some guns being moved, but the gentleman is suggesting that there is overwhelming evidence that it is a massive shipment of guns from Nicaragua to El Salvador, which is not supported by the facts.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not say that. The gentleman is exaggerating what I said. What I said was there is overwhelming evidence that the Nicaraguans directly supply the El Salvadoran Communists. There is overwhelming evidence the command and control for the El Salvadoran Communist is based in Nicaragua.

When we had the famous incident in the early 1980's in which two El Salvadoran Communists killed each other in a Nicaraguan hotel, that was pretty good evidence that they were spending time in Nicaragua.

Now, all I am saying, if you have absolute proof that Nicaragua is guilty, at least as guilty as Libya, and we have I think absolute proof. We have absolute ties of the Nicaraguans with other Communists.

We had an Ecuadoran terrorist picked up in El Salvador who was carrying money out of Nicaragua to the guerrillas and terrorists in Costa Rica. She was arrested in Costa Rica on her way to Ecuador.

We have absolute proof of tying them into the M-19 guerrillas in Columbia. I mean, nobody seriously disputes that, do they?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, I guess I do not quite understand. The gentleman is saying that Nicaragua is as terrorist a state as Libya and the evidence exists that the gentleman has available to him and to me to support that. Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. GINGRICH. Sure. Does the gentleman dispute that the Nicaraguan Communists have been systematically helping guerrillas and terrorists in parts of South and Central America?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. No. It is my judgment that there has been some of that help. It is also my judgment that when the gentleman comes to the floor and says that there has been a flood of that sort of thing going on, that the gentleman does not have the evidence to support that.

Now, the problem is——

Mr. GINGRICH. Now, wait a second. Now, hold it. There you go again.

I am suggesting to the gentleman that the evidence is incontrovertible that Nicaragua systematically supports terrorism in countries in South and Central America.

Now, I want to focus on that, because if the gentleman agrees that they do, that is clearly illegal and against the rules of the game and makes them an outlaw regime, makes them like Libya. Now, does the gentleman agree with that or not?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, what the gentleman suggests is that there is all sorts of evidence that is equated with the kind of evidence that most of us know exists about Libya. I do not know that for a fact.

I do not doubt for a moment, incidentially, that the Sandinistas, for whom I have no admiration, I have met them, I do not like them——

Mr. GINGRICH. This is not an admiration society.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I do not doubt for a moment that they are supportive and are soulmates of those who seek revolution in El Salvador; but what makes me uncomfortable is that those of us who do not want to send explosives to the hills are somehow painted as people who really enjoy the Sandinistas. I do not.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not say that.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I hope the Sandinistas leave one of these days and I think there are ways to persuade them to do that.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me make clear, because I do not want to suggest that it is a question of like or dislike. This is not a dating society.

We have, and I will be glad to meet any reasonable standard the gentleman wants to offer, we have evidence in the form of captured prisoners, in the form of intercepts by radio, in the form of actual weapons, we have evidence that the guerrillas and terrorists in at least three or four countries are directly overtly helped right now from Nicaragua.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, look, the gentleman's evidence, the evidence that the gentleman purports to represent is the same kind of evidence that we see here on the floor that in my judgment grotesquely distorts what we have to deal with.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman is saying that we could educate the French and I am saying the same National Security Agency, the same Central Intelligence Agency, the same Defense Intelligence Agency that would have educated the French are trying to educate the gentleman.

I will guarantee, we can go down tomorrow morning and I can get the gentleman more, as the gentleman well knows, more briefings on more data and more secret material than the gentleman could possibly want to spend time on.

Now, the gentleman is angry at the French because they do not believe the Agency about Libya that the gentleman does not want to believe about Nicaragua.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. No, no; I do not believe them about Nicaragua because they have not made a persuasive case about the extent to which the Sandinistas are exporting revolution successfully. Let me give the gentleman an example. I do not know whether the gentleman said it on the floor——

Mr. GINGRICH. Who is wrong, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency or the National Security Agency?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But permit me for a minute to give the gentleman an example. Let us describe precisely why the gentleman is wrong and where the administration is wrong.

One of the threats, obstensibly, the terrorist threat, is the 120,000 or 130,000 man army in Nicaragua, right?

That is the official line. I heard it in Nicaragua. I have heard it on this floor. I have heard it from the administration and I have heard it from intelligence sources. It is in the papers. It is in the periodicals. if there are 120,000 or 130,000 people in Nicaragua under arms and if the gentleman really believes that, then obviously the gentleman probably will pursue the course or advocate the course that the gentleman suggests on the floor of the House, but that is preposterous. That is no where near the truth. It does not nearly represent the empirical facts. The gentleman knows there are not that many men under arms in Nicaragua. All you have to do is visit Nicaragua and see for yourself.

When the gentleman says those things and the gentleman says he has evidence, that does not make them true or not true. While I oppose the Sandinistas I don't want to overinflate their military capability

Mr. GINGRICH. I just want to point out to my good friend, the gentleman is now doing precisely what I said earlier. The gentleman is saying that of the American intelligence government agencies——

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. No; that is not the case.

Mr. GINGRICH. Exactly what the gentleman said when the French were saying it.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. That is not the case. In fact, if we pin the intelligence agencies down about the troop strength in Nicaragua, eventually they will get off this nonsense that they try to sell to all of us about 120,000 people under arms in Nicaragua and eventually they will admit that that is not the case.

But that is the official line. That is what they are trying to tell us.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. It all depends on how you want to interpret the information.

What I think nearly anybody who observes Nicaragua today will say is that the number of people actually under arms in the Nicaraguan Army is 70,000 people. They have a 70,000-man army as such. There are about another 50,000 of trained people that they now regard as reserves that are available to them. So, in fact, if you put the two together, you have got that, but you can make the case that they do not have 120,000 men under arms at any particular time. They do have about 70,000 men under arms at any given time, and that is, in fact, the army that is there, that is their drafted army that is extremely unpopular in Nicaragua. And even if the army were half that size, even if it were half that size, it would still be twice the size of the army that Somoza had at his peak. He never had more than 15,000 people under arms in Nicaragua, and by anybody's estimate. I know you cannot possibly come up with an estimate lower than that for the Sandinistas.

So, in fact, the Communists have put more people under arms. They have approximately 70,000 people, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. I know our friend from Pennsylvania was not here earlier when I was trying to make my case, and I want to repeat it because I think it is important to keep this focused. All I was saying earlier was before the gentleman gets too angry at our European allies, we should recognize that the American left has for 16 years taught two principles. One is to always underestimate the threat, and the other is to always be inconsistent in sustaining our policies. And if you were Honduras, or you were Belgium, or you were France, you would worry about whether or not the U.S. House of Representatives would sustain Ronald Reagan's policies long enough to make them effective.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If the gentleman will yield, are you suggesting that the French support the policy you advocate?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, I am not.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Or Reagan's policy in Nicaragua? In fact, they oppose it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Wait a second. There you go again. I am trying to say to you that I have a very clear case to make, and my case is that simply there is a Soviet empire. It does use Communist Cuban colonial troops. There are 2,500 Cuban colonial troops in Nicaragua. They are helping prop up the Soviet colony in Nicaragua, which is actively helping terrorists today, and we can talk all we want about negotiations, but today we have evidence. The agencies that you want the French to believe are willing to say in secret briefings, and I think in public, and it is not just the administration line, because after all, even you are formulating the sentences the French Ambassador could use. He could say, well, the administration line was Qadhafi was really dangerous, but why should we believe the Central Intelligence Agency anymore than the American left believes the Central Intelligence Agency. And you are making my point for me, which is that I can give you absolutely incontrovertible proof that the Sandinista Communist Government, with the help of Cuban colonial troops, is advising, training and equipping terrorists today.

That is a military problem, and the least expensive and least risky military answer is to help the freedom fighters.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. You are suggesting somehow that the reason our allies have been so recalcitrant is that they do not believe the evidence. I do not think that is the case at all.

Mr. GINGRICH. No; they do not believe the Congress of this country has the firmness to stay the course. They are scared to death we will cut and run.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But you have just changed course yourself.

Mr. GINGRICH. No.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Yes, you have. You suggested that our allies have not supported us because they do not believe the intelligence agencies' information. I am saying I do not think is the case at all.

I think the case is that our allies are not prepared to do what we want them to do in supporting us against Qadhafi. That is an entirely different prospect, and the question is why.

Mr. GINGRICH. Wait a second. Our allies are more prepared or as prepared to support America and Ronald Reagan against Qadhafi as the American left is to support Ronald Reagan against Nicaragua.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. That is completely irrelevant.

Mr. GINGRICH. Why?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Because it has no relationship at all to our operations against Qadhafi and whether our allies should or will support us. I do not understand what that has to do with it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Of course they are tied at two levels. In the first place, as I said earlier, there is a direct relationship between Libya and Nicaragua. I mean, Qadhafi sent $400 million in economic assistance. As you know, there were four planeloads of assistance.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. There is a relationship between Libya and the French, but so what?

Mr. GINGRICH. In the case of Libya and Nicaragua, there were no French officials at Qadhafi's 15th anniversary. There have been no French officials praising the Nicaraguans for killing freedom fighters and for fighting in America's backyard. There is an active anti-American alliance on the planet, and I would say the difference between China and Russia is that the Soviet empire is based in Moscow and is actively anti-American and the Chinese are now sufficiently afraid of the Russians that they are actively pro-American against that empire.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Let me just, if I might, say this: I think you far too easily excuse our allies in our dealings with Libya.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think you are far too easily excusing the left.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I understand what you are doing and what you are saying. But I am saying that in my judgment, this country ought to be able to expect our allies to help us in the kind of operation we committed against Libya for very good purpose. As you said, the evidence was incontrovertible. We should be able to expect the help of the Italians, the Germans and others in dealing with Qadhafi.

Now what you are doing is using that to develop some other case for how the left or how the right ought to deal with this or that.

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But I am disappointed in our allies, and I would hope that you would be as well.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am disappointed, let me say, I am disappointed in our allies, but I fully understand why watching 16 years of a very confused America would make our allies a little cautious about following this Government and following the U.S. Congress. All I am saying, and I do not see how you can really disagree with this——

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, I do.

Mr. GINGRICH. There has been a huge gap between promise and performance in America's foreign policy for the last 16 years. And there are reasonable grounds for people who love freedom, but are a little worried about the Soviet empire, to sort of keep looking over their shoulder at this Chamber and wondering whether or not we are going to cut them off. I mean, Duarte, I think will tell you that it was a long, hard fight to get aid for El Salvador. I think all the freedom fighters in Nicaragua will tell you it is real hard to get aid, and I think the Hondurans will tell you, and again, I will be glad to arrange the briefings, although the gentleman clearly can get his own, they worry a great deal about now reliable an ally we are. You talked about how much money we put into Honduras. We put a lot more money into Vietnam, and we pulled out.

All I am saying is I think there are very practical reasons, based on the history of the U.S. House of Representatives since 1970, to worry if you are anyone else in the world relying on the United States, and I think the debate last month, and the intellectual pattern—I talk about the left, not Democrats, I talk about the left because there are some Republicans on the left intellectually, and there are a number of Democrats on the left intellectually. It is a world view which does not deal with the Soviet empire. It does not deal with Leninism, it does not deal with transnational conflict. Then it says, almost as though we were at EPCOT Center or Disneyworld, "Gosh, why don't we sit down and talk with these nice guys."

I will guarantee you that there are folks in this House who, if the Qadhafi situation is not cured in 2 weeks, there will be people getting up here saying, well, you know, we should be reasonable.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Can I just tell you that I taught economics very briefly in college, but was able to overcome that experience. You have to learn to overcome this history background as well, it seems to me.

Mr. GINGRICH. But it is real. It is not just history, it is real, and it is the world that we have lived through for several years.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. It is your view of that world. All I am saying is there is a gap between performance and promise in European foreign policy, country by country, in the last 15 years.

Mr. GINGRICH. Would you deny that history?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. But all I am saying is I think we should expect more from our allies.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask you a factual question. Did the U.S. Congress vote to cut off aid before the North Vietnamese attacked in 1975?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Just ask rhetorical questions.

Mr. GINGRICH. You say we are talking about history, but this is real. I mean, we know the historical facts. We have General Giap's memoirs which stated flatly that as head of the North Vietnamese army, they were shocked.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I think blame-America-first is wrong. It seems to me that we are reliable anyplace in the world that there has been trouble, and we have been there.

Mr. GINGRICH. But we do not always stay.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, we have sure been there, and we have been there first with the most in most cases. And I think it is too quick to blame America for all of these things now which we are dealing with.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am not blaming America. I am blaming the left, and I am blaming the U.S. House of Representatives. It is very precise, very small, defined.

Let me yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, because I think to just emphasize the point, we had to fight with everything we could against the American left in this body to get enough money and aid going to El Salvador to allow a democracy to flourish there. It was not more than 5 or 6 years ago that this body was lined up with daily speeches much like we heard on Nicaragua today down in this well suggesting that we ought not be doing anything in El Salvador that would support American policy there.

□ 1755

That somehow we were to blame, and we ought to let nature take its course, and if that ended up causing a Communist overthrow of the El Salvadoran Government, well, that is the way the world is.

We had those arguments out here, and we had to fight with everything we had in order to overcome that in order to give Duarte and his government a chance.

Today I heard people down here talking about this miracle of democracy that is taking place in Central America, and including in that El Salvador as one of the success stories. They were some of the very people who fought the hardest on this floor to cut off all aid to El Salvador and continue—some of the religious left in this country continues to have documentation out calling Duarte a fascist; that we ought to withdrawn support from.

So it seems to me that it is very clear that the gentleman is absolutely right, this is not something that is historical; this is happening now, and the problem is that the left cannot bring itself to support any of our allies anywhere, and so therefore they have reason to distrust us.

I just want to say, that I guess to build from what my friend from Pennsylvania said, there are a number of folks in this House who seem eager to take credit but are not too eager to do the work; and I would cite the number of Members who voted against building aircraft carriers who are delighted that we happen to have aircraft carriers available.

Frankly, there is a continuity in behavior.

I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Or people who go to Head Start Centers who voted against the Head Start appropriation. I mean, it is the same on all sides.

The only point I wanted to make is that the issue today in this country is Libya. It is one of the reasons you came to the floor, I think, is to draw a parallel.

With respect to Libya, the President took some action; he asserted power. In my judgment, the present facts show he did that correctly. The point I was trying to make to the gentleman from Georgia is that I think that the disappointment some of us have of what we feel our allies are responsible for and ought to be able to do for us in actions against Libya, are disappointments that are hard to get over.

I think we should—the Europeans are very capable of explaining why they will or will not do something; and you do not need to explain for France why it is confused.

Mr. GINGRICH. No, I am not explaining for France. I am trying, if I might say to my friend, first of all the issue is not Libya. The issue is the survival of freedom, the issue is the physical safety of Americans, the issue of our capacity in dealing not—you know, he is not a madman. He is a fanatic who believes sincerely in his views who is aided dramatically by the Soviet empire, who is the largest single purchaser of Soviet equipment, who sponsors terrorists, many of whom are trained by the Cubans and the Soviets, and I think it is precisely because—many of our good friends on the left are eager to rush and join the bandwagon against Qadhafi when in fact it is a much deeper, much more serious issue, and Qadhafi is the tip of the iceberg. It is the beginning of the problem.

Then we turn around—I will say to the gentleman, I lived in France as an Army brat when De Gaulle pulled out of NATO. I share, I understand. I lived personally through the experience of French nationalism.

The French were willing to die in Lebanon with us and did; the French, I suspect, if they were convinced we were going to be decisive and committed against Qadhafi will stay with us; they have been pretty good allies for a long time, but I suspect they have a certain fear of this Congress.

All I was saying earlier was, given the language I could cite from as recently as a month ago of the American left, I find it a little hard to have some of the Members of that very same movement getting up and attacking the French for acting out in reality what that movement preaches in Central America.

I will yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I guess my point in response to the gentleman would be that I am appalled by the behavior of allies. I think the gentleman in the well is appalled by the behavior of our allies.

They seem to swim in a fantasy land that will not admit the fact that there is a Soviet colonial empire that seeks to subvert freedom in their countries as well as in ours as well as in Third World countries.

I am appalled that they could not bring themselves to help us with Libya; in diplomatic ways, in economic ways, or ultimately in military ways, or at least endorsing what we determined to do militarily. I am appalled. I think it is disgusting.

My problem is that I see precisely the same behavior on the House floor, and I think that is what the gentleman is saying. I see the same crowd who, like our European allies, are willing to blame America first; I see the same crowd here who are willing to ignore the Soviet colonial empire; and my problem is that as appalled as I am with our allies, I have got to be just as appalled with politicians in this country who will not learn those lessons, either.

That is our problem. I condemn the allies, and in condemning the allies, I am also willing to condemn those politicians in this country who are just as blind as our allies are.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield just for a moment.

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I think the issue finally is not just for the left or the right and even the center; and yes there is a center. The issue is the use of power. When and how.

Mr. GINGRICH. Precisely.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. And we have deep disagreement in the U.S. Congress about that——

Mr. GINGRICH. That is exactly correct.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. And that is where we ought to have the disagreements, because we are the representatives of the American people to help control that use of power.

Mr. GINGRICH. All I was saying was, that if we do not have our act together as the leader of the free world, and in many ways on many occasions we do not; it should not surprise us that members of our alliance who are weaker and smaller and more vulnerable find it difficult to get their act together.

The United States desperately needs a calm, consistent, sustainable policy that contains the Soviet empire, that defeats the Cuban colonial forces and particularly defeats them by helping local freedom fighters who are willing to risk their lives to defeat Soviet imperialism.

When you have people with the courage of the Afghans and the Angolans and the Ethiopians and the Nicaraguans and the Cambodians, and they are begging for America to help so that they can have a fair chance to defeat the Soviet empire, then we are very foolish not to provide that help and not to make sure that the Soviet empire is contained before it endangers America.

I will be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. WALKER. Would it not be nice if we got some Poles and some Hungarians and Czechoslovakians and some Lithuanians and a lot of people like that who would also follow suit, knowing that America supported freedom fighters elsewhere, that would provide the kind of incentive that was needed to destroy the colonial empire other places.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 1116, GARRISON DIVERSION UNIT REFORMULATION ACT OF 1986

Mr. WHEAT, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-538) on the resolution (H. Res. 422) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1116) to implement certain recommendations made pursuant to Public Law 98-360, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

MONEY LAUNDERING PREVENTION ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 4573, the Money Laundering Prevention Act of 1986 with my colleague, the Honorable RICHARD SCHULZE.

For the benefit of the Members, I wish to include a section-by-section analysis of this bill at this point in the RECORD:

EXPLANATIONS OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

The general purposes of the proposed amendments are (1) to subject a person who launders money to potential civil and criminal penalties for certain money laundering activity, i.e., causing a financial institution not to file a required report or to file an incorrect report and structuring or assisting in structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements, (2) to add an "attempt" provision, and (3) to create a program for forfeiting monetary instruments, or property interests traceable to those instruments, involved in violations of 31 U.S.C. § 5313 by persons other than financial institutions.

SECTION 1

Under present law, money launderers are successfully prosecuted in some judicial circuits for causing financial institutions not to file reports on multiple currency transactions totaling more than $10,000 or causing financial institutions to file incorrect reports. In such cases, defendants are charged with violations of 18 U.S.C. § 2 (aiding and abetting or causing another to commit an offense) and § 1001 (concealing from the government a material fact by a trick, scheme, or device). For example, in United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1983), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 1001 where the defendants had engaged in a money laundering scheme in which they had structured a series of currency transactions, each one less than $10,000 but totaling more than $10,000, to evade the reporting requirements. See also United States v. Massa, 740 F.2d 629, 645 (8th Cir. 1984), cert. denied sub nom Skinner v. United States, U.S. , 105 S. Ct. 2357 (1985); United States v. Sanchez Vazquez, 585 F.Supp. 990, 993 (N.D. Ga. 1984); United States v. Konefal, 566 F.Supp. 698 (N.D.N.Y. 1983) (prosecution for structuring upheld under Title 31). In contrast, the First Circuit Court of Appeals, in United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1985), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559 (11th Cir. 1986), and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758 (9th Cir., 1986) have held that structuring currency transactions to avoid the reporting requirements did not violate 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a) would codify Toubon-Builes and like cases and would negate the effect of Anzalone, Varbel and Denemark. The proposed amendment would expressly subject to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact. In addition, the proposed amendment would create the offense of structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements, without regard for whether an individual transaction is, itself, reportable under the Bank Secrecy Act. For example, a person who converts $18,000 in currency to cashier's checks by purchasing two $9,000 cashier's checks at two different banks or on two different days with the specific intent that the participating bank or banks not be required to file Currency Transaction Reports for those transactions, would be subject to potential civil and criminal liability and the currency (or such monetary instruments as the Secretary prescribes) or property traceable to the currency would be subject to seizure and forfeiture under the proposed amendment in section 2. A person conducting the same transactions for any other reasons or a person splitting up an amount of currency that would not be reportable if the full amount were involved in a single transaction, e.g., splitting $2,000 in currency into four transactions of $500 each, would not be subject to liability under the proposed amendment.

The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a) would also add a much-needed attempt provision to the Bank Secrecy Act. Under current law, a financial institution is not required to report a currency transaction until 15 days after the transaction has taken place; therefore, a reporting violation does not occur until (1) 15 days have passed since the time of the transaction and (2) the financial institution has failed to file a report. This situation creates two problems for prosecutions of persons who have structured their transactions to avoid the reporting requirements of the Bank Secrecy Act. First, after 15 days the money launderers may have fled, and the investigative trail may be cold. Second, an individual who has attempted to avoid the reporting requirements may escape liability if the financial institution, despite the efforts of the money launderer, files a timely, correct report. The proposed attempt provision would cure these present flaws by: (1) authorizing an earlier seizure of individuals and funds, and (2) subjecting individuals who attempt to frustrate the reporting requirements of the Act to potential criminal liability at the time of their attempt and not 15 days later.

31 U.S.C. § 5317 would be amended to add a new subsection (d), which would, for the first time, allow property related to a violation of section 5313, to be seized and forfeited. This new subsection would be directed primarily at a person who launders money or attempts to launder money in collusion with a financial institution, who intentionally subverts or who attempts to subvert the reporting requirements by causing or attempting to cause an "innocent" or otherwise unwitting financial institution to fail to file a report or to file a materially incomplete or inaccurate report, or a person who structures or assists in structuring a transaction for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements, where a report would, but for its artificial structure, be required under section 5313(a). For example, a person may engage in a pattern of cash deposits at a financial institution where each deposit involves less than $10,000 in currency and where the total of the deposits equals substantially more than $10,000. If the activity were performed in an attempt to cause the financial institution to fail to file a report required by section 5313(a), or if the activity is a transaction structured for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of section 5313(a), the currency used or intended to be used, or the interest in the property traceable to such currency would be subject to seizure and forfeiture. The fact that the violation was not willful would be a defense to the forfeiture. Willfulness in a forfeiture case would be determined under the civil, reckless disregard standard in this, a civil, in rem forfeiture action.

This forfeiture provision is intended to reach interests in property which can be clearly traced to the currency that gave rise to the section 5313(a) violation. It would reach monies deposited in bank accounts or other types of financial accounts, e.g., checking accounts, money market accounts, and certificates of deposit, and would apply to real and personal property that had been purchased by a violator with a monetary instrument that gave rise to a section 5313(a) violation. However, the provision is not intended to apply to the property interests of innocent third parties. It would not apply to cash received by an innocent bank, in which the money launderer no longer had any property interest, that a money launderer had used in the purchase of a cashier's check, but it would apply to the cashier's check in the hands of the money launderer or in the hands of the person on whose behalf the money launderer was acting. The fact that a person was a bona fide purchaser for value without knowledge of the violation would be a defense to forfeiture.

The amendment is needed because current forfeiture authority is an inadequate tool against money laundering. For example, forfeiture authority under federal drug laws, 21 U.S.C. § 881, requires a finding of probable cause to believe that the money was used in connection with a violation of the drug laws. Laundered money is frequently connected to violations of drug laws; however, money laundering is also used for non-drug criminal activity and, even where the operation is part of a drug trafficking organization, the money laundering can be arranged so that it is difficult, if not impossible, to prove such a connection.

Section 5317(c) is amended to provide express authority to seize assets clearly traceable to a monetary instrument being transported or which has been transported in violation of section 5316. The violation of section 5316 need not be willful in order for an unreported monetary instrument to be subject to seizure and forfeiture. Customs law relating to seizure, forfeiture and disposition of property continue to apply, to the extent not inconsistent with the Bank Secrecy Act, to forfeitures under this subsection.

Current tax assessment and collection statutes, 26 U.S.C. §§ 6851 and 6861, are also an inadequate tool against money laundering. Tax assessment and collection under such statutes requires proof that a Title 26 tax deficiency is in jeopardy. This involves a computation of taxable income, which is a difficult computation with respect to illegal activity. Furthermore, since only the tax deficiency is collectable under such authority, much of the laundered money is unreachable.

Tax assessment and collection authority under 26 U.S.C. § 6867 is also an inadequate tool against money laundering. That authority permits a jeopardy/termination assessment against a person "in physical possession" of cash (or equivalent) who does not claim ownership or who claims that an unknown third person owns the money but permits seizure of only fifty percent of the cash, as income tax due. The balance is available to a person who comes forward to claim ownership. The launderer or actual owner of the money may be able to regain half of it.

In contrast, the proposed forfeiture authority is likely to be a very valuable tool against money laundering. As evidence of the usefulness of such forfeiture authority, one can look to current forfeiture authority under the Bank Secrecy Act. Under such authority, large amounts of currency, i.e., more than $10,000, that a money launderer moves into or out of the country may be seized and forfeited to the United States if he fails to report it. This forfeiture authority has been used often and effectively as an important weapon in Treasury's war against money launderers.

Numerous case examples demonstrate how effective the proposed forfeiture authority can be. Following are three situations involving reporting violations where the proposed forfeiture authority would have enhanced law enforcement capabilities. The fourth example is a non-willful violation where no forfeiture would occur.

An investigation developed evidence that a group of suspected narcotic traffickers had willfully caused domestic financial institutions not to file required Currency Transaction Reports on transactions totaling more than $50 million. However, the investigation did not develop sufficient admissible evidence to connect the laundered money to violations of the drug laws. Therefore, the money was not forfeitable under the current forfeiture authority at 21 U.S.C. § 881. Under the proposed forfeiture authority, the entire $50 million, or assets traceable to it, would have been forfeitable. Note that such assets in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value would not have been forfeitable.

Case No. 2

A South Florida money laundering specialist laundered $57 million over 18 months through various Miami bank accounts. He deposited duffel bags and boxes filled with cash into accounts at Miami banks in collusion with certain bank officials; the banks filed no reports. The funds were transferred from the Miami accounts to other accounts and ultimately to Colombia. The admissible evidence in this case did not tie the $57 million to narcotics activity; therefore, the Government was unable to seize any of the funds under 21 U.S.C. § 881. Under the proposed forfeiture authority, the funds might have been seized prior to their leaving the United States. Furthermore, even if law enforcement officers had been unable to seize the money before it left the country, the proposed amendments would have authorized a civil penalty equal to the amount of the unreported currency.

Case No. 3

An individual represented to numerous financial institutions that he was conducting business as a bullion dealer and that he would be depositing large amounts of currency with those institutions. He opened business accounts, using his true name and the name of a bullion-dealer organization.

He was not, in fact, a bullion dealer but was a money launderer. The bullion-dealer organization was strictly a shell corporation he used to launder money for his clients.

Over a 12-month period he deposited about $10 million in currency into 40 different accounts with 25 financial institutions in Florida and California. He drew checks on the accounts, payable to nominee names, which were then given to his clients. The check amounts were slightly less than the deposit amounts and the difference represented his money laundering commission.

The individual filed Federal tax returns, showing his occupation as a bullion dealer. Gross receipts on the tax returns approximated the amounts deposited into the bank accounts. Cost of goods sold (expenses) shown on the returns approximated the amount of the checks drawn on the accounts. The profit on the returns resulted from the commissions.

Although the banks filed reports on the individual's transactions, the individual would have violated amended 31 U.S.C. § 5313 (he did violate 18 U.S.C. § 1001) because he made a material misstatement of fact, i.e., a false occupation and a false business name, which caused the bank to file a form containing a material misstatement of fact. Current statutes do not allow for seizure of any of the funds deposited in the bank accounts. The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. §§ 5313(a) adding 5317(d) would subject these deposited funds to seizure and forfeiture.

A person has saved money to purchase a home, and, according to the real estate broker, needed a $9,000 down payment. On the day of the closing, she went to her bank and withdrew $9,000 in currency. When she arrived at the closing, her broker revealed that he had made an error in his calculations and that she needed $11,000, not $9,000, for the down payment. She returned to her bank and withdrew another $2,000 in currency. Because she withdrew the $11,000 in currency in two transactions, the bank filed no report, despite the requirement on the report form that multiple transactions within a 24-hour period be aggregated and treated as a single transaction. Her withdrawal of the $11,000 in currency in two transactions presumably caused the bank to fail to file a required Currency Transaction Report; however, she would not have been criminally liable and her interest in the house would not have been subject to forfeiture under the proposed amendments because she had not willfully caused the bank to fail to file a required report and her transactions were not structured for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements.

Finally, it should be noted that the forfeiture provision proposed at 31 U.S.C. § 5317(d) for use with respect to domestic currency transactions is more limited in scope than most forfeiture provisions including the one already existing at 26 U.S.C. § 7302 for use with respect to violations of the internal revenue laws. Under 26 U.S.C. § 7302 any property used or intended for use in violation of the internal revenue laws may be forfeited. Under the proposed legislation for domestic currency transactions, the basic types of property subject to forfeiture are very limited. Only coins, currency, and certain other monetary instruments and property traceable to such monetary instruments may be seized and forfeited. Further restrictions exclude property from forfeiture if (1) the person violating the domestic currency transactions requirements is a domestic financial institutional examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, (2) the owner is a bona fide purchaser for value who took without notice of the violation, and (3) if the violation or attempted violation was not willful.

31 U.S.C. § 5321 would be amended by adding a new subsection (a)(4) authorizing a civil penalty against a person who willfully violates section 5313(a). No amendment is necessary to 31 U.S.C. § 5322 for imposition of criminal penalties for violations of section 5313(a). Civil penalties can be imposed where a person had specific intent to violate the law or acted with reckless disregard for the law. This standard for willfulness is consistent with case law construing willfulness in civil penalty contexts and with Treasury's interpretation of willfullness under the Bank Secrecy Act.

The proposed civil penalty would complement the proposed forfeiture provision authorizing a civil penalty sufficient to fill the gap between the value of the property seized under proposed section 5317(d) and the value of the financial instruments involved in the unlawful transactions. This mirrors current treatment of forfeiture of monetary instruments seized under section 5317 and civil penalties imposed under section 5321(a)(2) (for violations of Bank Secrecy Act reporting requirements regarding transporting currency into or out of the United States).

The authority of the Internal Revenue Service to forfeit property is currently set forth in 26 U.S.C. § 7302 and is limited to property used or intended to be used in violating the internal revenue laws. IRS agents enforce and administer laws in Title 31 of the United States Code (the currency transaction reporting provisions) in addition to the internal revenue laws. The proposed amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 7302 would allow the IRS to use the procedures under this provision to forfeit property under proposed 31 U.S.C. § 5317(d).

It should be clearly understood that the forfeiture authority under section 7302 of Title 26 and the procedures relating to the administration and disposition of forfeited property are entirely separate and distinct from the provisions for the seizure of property for the collection of taxes provided under subchapter D of chapter 64 of Title 26.

SECTION 5

Those with an interest in property seized for forfeiture by the Internal Revenue Service may file a petition for remission or mitigation. The Internal Revenue Service applies the customs laws relating to remission or mitigation (26 U.S.C. § 7327). The authority to remit forfeitures under the Bank Secrecy Act rests with the Secretary of the Treasury under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(c).

Petitions for remission or mitigation are expected to be rare. Seizures will only be made by trained law enforcement personnel. Seizures will normally be reviewed by legal counsel before they are made. The vast majority of seizures will be made under a search warrant obtained from a United States magistrate after a review of the circumstances to determine if there is probable cause.

It is anticipated that the procedures for remission or mitigation will be similar to the current IRS procedures for property subject to administrative forfeiture. A petition must be filed with the Internal Revenue Service District Director for the district in which the property was seized. The requirements and rules concerning the contents of such a petition under the internal revenue laws are set forth in the Internal Revenue Service's regulations at 26 C.F.R. §§ 403.35–403.45. A petition must be filed not later than three months after the sale or other disposition of the property. The petition must (1) contain a description of the property, (2) indicate the nature and amount of the petitioner's interest in the property, (3) show that the petitioner was not willfully negligent and did not intend that the property be used in violation of the law, (4) set forth documents supporting the claims made in the petition (such as contracts and bills of sale), (5) indicate that costs (such as those relating to seizure and storage) assessed as a condition of allowance of the petition will be paid by the claimant, and (6) state how the property came into the possession of the person whose act caused the seizure, and that the petitioner had no knowledge or reason to believe that the property would be used in violations of the law where the petitioner did not commit the act which caused the seizure of the property. The assessment of costs is discretionary with those allowing a petition and therefore may be waived.

In reviewing petitions, consideration is given to factors such as (1) whether the petitioner had a recognizable, good-faith interest in the property, (2) whether the petitioner played any part in or had knowledge of the violation or should have had knowledge of the violation, (3) the petitioner's criminal record, and (4) whether the petition was timely filed.

Finally, it should be noted that provision is made in the law and regulations for consideration of petitions for mitigation where a forfeiture would cause undue hardship. This authority may be exercised where the petitioner has not or cannot meet the conditions for remission but where other extenuating circumstances are present indicating that some relief should be granted to avoid hardship. Basically, the contents and procedures for petitions for mitigation are the same as those for remission.

Normally, petitions for remission or mitigation of our types of IRS forfeitures have been granted in around two months. However, in certain instances where a petitioner's noninvolvement, innocence, and ownership is clear, property can be returned more quickly.

Additionally, seized property may be returned to its owner if it was seized in error or if there is insufficient evidence to support the forfeiture. This can be done in a few days whether or not a petition has been filed.

All remission and mitigation determinations relating to property over a certain dollar amount, e.g., $100,000, would be approved by the Assistant Secretary (Enforcement).

SECTIONS 6 AND 7

Current law limits IRS agents' seizure authority to "property subject to forfeiture under the internal revenue laws". The amended language is required to authorize IRS officers to seize property subject to forfeiture under Title 31. The changes coordinate with the change in section 7302.

DECONTROL NATURAL GAS NOW

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, today 20 colleagues and I, Democrats and Republicans alike, introduced legislation to promote competition in the natural gas market, to provide consumers and producers with access to transportation and to make available ample supplies of natural gas at the lowest reasonable price. This legislation, the Natural Gas Policy Act Amendments of 1986, has been submitted to the Congress by the Department of Energy. It is an excellent bill that would do much to improve our Nation's energy security and would expand the use of a clean-burning and abundant domestic fuel.

The Department of Energy estimates that if this bill were passed, natural gas prices would be lower by 10 to 20 cents per thousand cubic feet per year between 1987 and 1995. Allowing producers of gas from old fields to get market prices for that gas would result in the production of 30 to 34 trillion cubic feet over the next 40 years. This is equivalent to nearly 2 years of domestic natural gas consumption. Without legislation decontrolling old natural gas, this 2-year supply of gas will never be produced.

Passage of this bill will not be easy. It will take political courage to overcome the inertia, bogymen, and partisan politics that have blocked good natural gas legislation. The Secretary of Energy is serious about this legislation. The President is serious about natural gas decontrol. He said so in his State of the Union Address. The other body held a hearing on this bill and other natural gas legislation this week. I and those cosponsoring this legislation are serious about it and we plan to work for it.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to look at this legislation. Let's work together to get it passed. A section-by-section analysis, a fact sheet on the bill and an editorial from the April 7 oil and gas journal follows:

FACTSHEET—NATURAL GAS POLICY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

SUMMARY

The Administration bill will promote competition in the natural gas market and will ensure that consumers receive adequate supplies of natural gas at reasonable prices.

The Administration bill will result in lower average gas prices, increased domestic gas production and consumption, reduced payments for imported oil and gas supplies, and an improved balance-of-trade.

Reduced prices for high cost supplies and increased production of low-cost old gas supplies will lower gas prices by an average of about $0.10 to $0.20 per thousand cubic feet per year between 1987 and 1995.

Market prices for old gas will result in increased production from existing old gas reserves of about 30 to 34 tcf over the next 40 years, including about 12 to 14 tcf from delayed abandonment, 15.5 tcf from infill drilling, and 2.5 to 4.5 tcf from production enhancement.

The Administration bill will result in net economic benefits of about $16 billion (1984 dollars) over the next ten years relative to current regulations.

PROVISIONS OF THE ADMINISTRATION BILL

The Administration bill includes "open access" provisions that require interstate pipelines to provide transportation on a nondiscriminatory basis and to the fullest extent practicable.

Upon enactment, the Administration bill decontrols all natural gas wellhead prices subject to new or renegotiated contracts. All remaining Federal wellhead price controls are to be removed on April 1, 1987.

The Administration bill will prevent contracts containing an area rate clause, with no other indefinite price escalator clause, from reverting to extemely low fixed prices.

Provisions in current law that arbitrarily restrain the demand for natural gas, including certain provisions of the Fuel Use Act and the incremental pricing provision of the NGPA, are repealed.

BENEFITS OF THE ADMINISTRATION BILL

The Administration bill will open access to available interstate pipeline transportation capacity.

Open access will increase the competition between pipelines and producers and thereby ensure least-cost gas supplies to consumers.

Open access will ensure that the benefits of increased competition in the natural gas market extend to all consumers.

The Administration bill will result in lower average natural gas prices and increased gas market flexibility.

After partial decontrol, average wellhead prices declined by about 5 percent in real terms during 1985. Under full decontrol, average prices are projected to fall by about 14 to 17 percent in the first year after enactment, or by about $0.25 to $0.45 per mcf.

Decontrol of all gas prices will result in the production of 30 to 34 tcf of old gas reserves that would not be produced under current regulations. This additional production will occur at the rate of about 750 to 850 bcf per year for the next 40 years.

Increased production of old gas reserves will lower gas prices and encourage renegotiation of contracts that hold high-cost gas prices above market-clearing levels.

Lower gas prices, increased consumption and production of old gas reserves, and renegotiation of high-cost contracts will rapidly dissipate the inefficient surplus of deliverable gas supplies.

Lower domestic gas prices will also force prices for imported gas to decline, reducing payments for imported gas by about $3 billion to $5 billion between 1987 and 1995.

Lower prices for natural gas will also reduce oil imports by about 300 to 350 thousand barrels per day on average from 1987 to 1995, resulting in an annual reduction of $1.6 billion to $3.2 billion in the U.S. balance-of-payments deficit.

Repeal of demand restraints will allow all consumers to choose the least-costly fuel available.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—NATURAL GAS POLICY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

TITLE I—OPEN ACCESS TO TRANSPORTATION

Section 101 would revise Natural Gas Policy Act [NGPA] section 311(a) to expand voluntary transactions for gas transportation. This, and the following section on "Open Access Carriage," are intended to open the transportation system to competition. As a result, all gas supplies, including low-cost gas now shut-in, would become available at prices that reflect the highly competitive nature of the wellhead and burner-tip markets for natural gas.

NGPA section 311(a) currently permits the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to authorize transportation by interstate pipelines on behalf of an intrastate pipeline or local distribution company, and by an intrastate pipeline on behalf of any interstate pipeline or local distribution company served by an interstate pipeline. Section 101 would expand NGPA section 311(a) to permit the Commission to authorize any pipeline to transport gas on behalf of any person. The use of the phrase "any person" is not intended to reflect any view concerning the persons on whose behalf gas currently can be transported under section 311(a), but rather to indicate the broadest application of section 311(a).

Section 101 also would add a new paragraph (4) to NGPA section 311(a) to make clear transportation under that section must be non-discriminatory. There is no legitimate reason to discrimination in an open, market-oriented system. Discrimination hinders competition, and thus is at cross purposes with the Congressional determination in the NGPA that the wellhead market is competitive and that consumers are best served by letting competitive forces work.

In addition, new paragraph (4) would require any natural gas company which received gas pursuant to section 311(a) to offer section 311(a) transportation service. It is intended that those who benefit from section 311(a) transportation services must offer the same service to others.

These changes would not affect the basic thrust of the Commission's recent action in Order No. 436. Rather, these changes are intended to codify the spirit of that action and to reinforce the Commission's generic authority to promote and provide for voluntary transportation arrangements, and thereby to increase the competitive flow of gas in commerce at market-sensitive prices.

Section 102 would add a new section 316 to the NGPA providing for "Open Access Carriage." Section 316 would provide that, upon application by any person, the Commission shall direct an interstate pipeline to transport gas unless the pipeline demonstrates to the Commission it is incapable of rendering the service. This section is intended to open the natural gas market to the operation of the laws of supply and demand to the fullest extent. It would remove barriers to open transportation that now exist, and would allow willing buyers and sellers to deal directly to bring low cost, currently shut-in gas to market. This section responds to the failure of most interstate pipelines to participate in Order No. 436, and to the conditions that precipitated Order No. 436 in the first place: the inability of consumers to obtain transportation for gas purchased directly from producers.

In determining whether a pipeline is "incapable" of rendering service the Commission, it is intended, would avoid interpretations that prevent carriage. The Commission should consider such factors as full pipeline utilization, full use of pipeline interconnections and compression, and displacement or other ways of facilitating transportation. The primary concern of the Commission, in making this determination, must be to ensure competition in the marketplace through the utilization of pipeline capacity to the fullest extent practicable.

The Commission is given the option to implement this section either by rule or order. This is intended to give the Commission the flexibility to act on applications as circumstances vary while preventing abuse of its processes that would delay open carriage. This section makes clear it shall operate without discrimination. Finally, the charge for transportation under this section must be just and reasonable, as that term has been defined under the Natural Gas Act.

TITLE II—REMOVAL OF WELLHEAD PRICE CONTROLS AND REPEAL OF JURISDICTION OVER CERTAIN FIRST SALES

Section 201 would amend NGPA section 121 to provide for the ultimate elimination of all price controls on first sales of natural gas. New subsection (f) would provide that natural gas sold under contracts executed or renegotiated after March 1, 1986, would be free from any NGPA price controls. This provision Section 315(c) permits the Commission to require the filing of contracts for the first sale of natural gas. The repeal of the existing NGPA section 315, along with the elimination of the Commission's NGA jurisdiction over first sales (see section 202(a)), would remove all non-price regulation of first sales of natural gas.

Section 203 would add a new section 315 to the NGPA providing for "the effect of area rate clauses" following decontrol. For a certain, limited number of contracts, the section would treat the last price paid for NGPA section 104 or 106(a) gas before decontrol on April 1, 1987, as a Federally-established rate or charge for purposes of area rate clauses. The contracts involved are those containing an area rate clause and no other indefinite price escalator clause, and only if the contract was entered into when the Federal Government prohibited an indefinite escalator provision other than an area rate clause. The intent of this section is to deal with situations where the Federal Government in effect dictated the price terms to the commercial parties. It would prevent a roll-back to extremely low fixed prices in contracts where the parties were unable to deal with this eventuality because of Federal interference with contract terms. This section thus would continue the status-quo, and would prevent both uncertainty over the applicable pricing terms and litigation that might result from that uncertainty.

TITLE III—REPEAL OF CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS ON NATURAL GAS AND PETROLEUM USE AND PRICING

Sections 301 and 302 would repeal several sections of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 [FUA].

The bill would repeal (1) the prohibitions on the use of natural gas and petroleum as a primary energy source in new electric powerplants (FUA § 201) and new major fuel-burning installations (FUA § 202), (2) the prohibition on the construction of new powerplants without alternate fuel capability (FUA § 201), and (3) the discretionary authority of the Secretary of Energy to prohibit nonboiler installations from using natural gas and petroleum as a primary energy source (FUA § 202).

The bill would repeal section 302 of FUA which authorizes the Secretary of Energy to prohibit the use of natural gas or petroleum as a primary energy source where coal or alternate fuel capability exists in existing major fuel-burning installations.

The Secretary of Energy's authority under section 401 of FUA to prohibit the use of natural gas as a primary energy source in certain boilers would be repealed.

The bill would repeal section 402 of FUA which prohibits certain installations of new outdoors lighting fixtures that use natural gas and certain uses of natural gas therein.

The bill would repeal section 405 of FUA which authorizes the Secretary of Energy to restrict, by rule, increases in the use of petroleum as a primary energy source in existing powerplants that used coal or another alternate fuel in 1977.

The bill would repeal subsections 103(a)(16), (a)(18), (a)(19) and (a)(29) of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978, which provide certain definitions for general reference that are no longer necessary due to the proposed repeal of many statutory provisions.

Section 303 would repeal title II of the NGPA, which provides for an incremental pricing system whereby low priority users of natural gas pay a larger share of the first sale acquisition costs for natural gas, and thus would end this regulatory system. Acquisition costs incurred prior to the enactment of this bill would be passed through to users on the basis of the existing Commission regulations for incremental pricing. Any acquisition costs incurred after the enactment of this bill would be dealt with without regard to incremental pricing requirements.

TAKE OR PAY ISSUE MUST NOT BLOCK NEEDED GAS INDUSTRY ACTION

The U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission acted correctly late last month in refusing to grant interstate natural gas pipelines across-the-board relief from troublesome take or pay contracts with producers.

There's no denying that, for some pipelines, take or pay liabilities are major problems. Existence of contract problems for some pipelines, however, is insufficient reason for the government to intervene in contracts industrywide. And it is no reason at all for the government to refrain from doing what the market needs most: moving to free market pricing for gas the quickest way possible.

Pipelines have a reasonable concern over what happened—or didn't happen—to take or pay in FERC's landmark Orders 436 and 436-A last year dealing with natural gas transportation. The orders offer expedited certification to pipelines agreeing to provide transportation service on a nondiscriminatory basis. Pipelines accepting the orders' terms subject themselves to loss of firm contract demand. While they lose contract customers, however, they gain no compensating relief from their contract purchase obligations to producers under high-cost and take or pay contracts. And the bind is complicated by an earlier order that limited pipelines' abilities to recover variable costs through minimum commodity bills.

Critical to the issue, however, is a point that FERC acknowledged in rejecting pipelines' requests for reconsideration of Orders 436 and 436-A. The pipelines wanted the commission to tie nondiscriminatory transportation service to blanket take or pay relief. Pipeline groups similarly are trying to make such relief a condition of the Department of Energy's proposed end to old gas vintaging. The point FERC acknowledged in the Order 436/436-A case—and it's point that applies as well to the DOE proposal—is that take or pay isn't an industrywide problem. Therefore, government abrogation of private contracts industrywide is unwarranted.

A 1984 Foster Associates Inc. study for Natural Gas Supply Association, a producers group with an obvious interest in preserving take or pay contracts, found that only four out of 36 major interstate pipelines had historically high take or pay liabilities during the study period. Since then, moreover, negotiations have eased the difficulties in at least some cases. Pipelines bristle at the suggestion that take or pay is anything other than a daunting problem, and for specific pipelines it is precisely that. for many others, however, it is not.

To the extent Orders 436 and 436-A unfairly tip the contract balance in pipelines' disfavor, the remedy may lie in amending the provisions that allow pipelines' firm customers to phase out their contract purchase obligations. It certainly should not be in allowing all pipelines to walk away from their take obligations with producers.

Neither should the take or pay issue prevent FERC from seriously considering DOE's stop-gap move to rationalize gas prices. The gas market's core problem is the lingering volume of gas subject to price controls. Contractual snags, supply/demand imbalances, and regulatory uncertainties all stem from the government's bungled manipulation of gas prices and uses. There will be no order in the gas market until all price and market controls are removed. Congress won't do what's right, so DOE is offering a second-best alternative. An end to vintaging would mean pipelines would lose access to artificially cheap gas, which is why they object to the DOE plan. But their objections are far less compelling than the prospect of a gas industry made less subject to the uncertainties and distortions of government meddling.

Slowly but surely, the gas industry is becoming less a creature of government and more a creature of the market. The evolution has its hazards, among them fluctuation of supply and demand. The current deliverability surplus is aggravated by demand loss due to falling oil prices and rising U.S. imports of Canadian gas. The industry is suffering, but producers—who have lost both markets and margins—are hurting most. Pipelines ought to look more to their suppliers—whose needs to move gas are at least as urgent as their own—and less to FERC for solutions to take or pay problems. It's how business increasingly will be done as deregulation progresses, slowly or otherwise. Producers and pipelines might find they have significant mutual interests—such as the future health of their industry.

One of the biggest problems facing the country today is the fact that we Americans are energy dependent on other nations of the world. We use today in this country about 15,000,000 barrels of oil per day, and we import a little better than one-third of those, in excess of 5,000,000 barrels of oil per day. It is important that this country have a policy which will produce the most energy at a reasonable price for the foundation of the industry of this country. For some reason over the years a policy position of Congress relating to natural gas legislation has been encumbered by regulations which go back over 30 years, specifically to 1954 and even before that.

In 1978 Congress passed the Natural Gas Policy Act, which constructively did much to ease some regulations with respect to the production of natural gas for the country.

As a result of that legislation, about one-half of the natural gas in the country became deregulated on January 1, 1985. The other one-half of the natural gas is still regulated and will continue in that status until Congress takes some action to do otherwise. Historially this question of deregulation of natural gas prices has a tendency to have one section of the country interface and be in contest with another. Specifically the States of the Union that produce the most natural gas such as Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and we produce a lot of it in California as well, have been perceived by those States in the Union that do not produce energy, natural gas or otherwise, as being in the catbird's seat.

This results unfortunately in Members of Congress coming from non-energy-producing States to, as they see the light, have a tendency to vote in such a way as to place restriction on the price of the energy this country needs. This has resulted in the controls on natural gas that exist at the present time relating to about one-half of the natural gas produced in the country. We have another very fundamental problem and a solution that this legislation offers to resolve; namely how do we clean up the air that is polluted in America? Of all the energy sources that we could use, coal, nuclear, oil, geothermal, and natural gas, the one that is the least polluting is natural gas. We have 29 nonattainment areas in the country under the Clean Air Act, and these areas are required by Federal law to take action to improve the air quality of their regions in order that the people who happen to live there will be able to breathe clean air and live a better life. All Americans support that goal.

My area in southern California is one of the nonattainment areas of the country. We would rather burn natural gas than any other fuel to fire the boilers to run the generators of electricity and produce the energy with it, without which our country cannot survive.

It is interesting to note today that just recently legislation was introduced by many Members of the House relating to placing a huge tax burden on the production of coal in this country and, indeed, a tax burden on all energy produced in the country in the form of electricity rates so that we could develop a huge fund to clean up coal that is being burned in energy producing plants, powerplants around the country.

A good number of these are in the Middle West of the United States and are said to be responsible for the creation of acid rain that is plaguing much of the country today, not only in the United States but in Canada as well. So when you look at it, what we are going about is creating a fund by taxing the production of energy, all forms of energy in order to clean up coal being produced so that it does not produce sulfides and oxides of nitrogen into the atmosphere, which is a constructive goal. But we should also understand that natural gas is an energy that can be used in these powerplants around the country without the necessity of engaging in an expensive means of cleaning up the production of the power when the natural gas is used as the energy source.

The main reason that this Member from California is supporting the deregulation of natural gas is not because I am solicitous of the welfare of the owners of the natural gas in the ground, whether they are located in Kansas or Texas or Louisiana or Oklahoma or California; those people can take care of themselves very well. But the reason that this policymaker is very much interested in deregulating the price of that gas is very simple. Whenever the Government sets a maximum price below the market, you get a shortage, and whenever the Government sets a minimum price above the market, you get a surplus. That explains why we have a surplus of teenage labor in America. That also explains why in those communities in the country where we put price controls on rental housing we have a shortage of rental housing for some reason. Similarly, this price control practice of the Federal Government on natural gas is primarily responsible for the shortage of natural gas that this country experienced in the 1970's.

It is in the interest of increasing the production of natural gas that we deregulate the price and let the market force determine what price will be available to the producers of that gas in the marketplace. And there is a great deal of common sense that any layman can easily understand with respect to this whole issue of natural gas pricing. Put yourself in the shoes of the owners of the gas field. And if the Federal Government today is saying that you are going to get 20 cents per unit, per mcf, or 40 cents or $1 or $1.25, depending on when that particular field came into production and the market clearing price is somewhere around $2.25, which is where it is today, are you going to want to produce gas from that field?

I do not think so. You are going to use every method within the law to keep that gas in the ground with the idea that someday reality will come to the regulators in Washington, DC, and you will be able to get a market price for that gas, bring it out of the ground and put it in the energy supply system of this country. That is the very point of this legislation. Numerous experts testified before our Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, on which I serve, to the effect that if we deregulate the price of old gas we will bring into the production stream of America between 20 and 40 trillion cubic feet of the gas that we would otherwise never achieve.

Now how do we do that? Bear in mind we use about 18 to 20 trillion cubic feet of gas per year. So that is about a 1- to 2-year supply of natural gas which we otherwise will never get if we do not regulate the price as I indicated.

The reason that that statement is true is because of three factors. If the price of old gas is deregulated, there are incentives in the economic sense that come into existence which cause the producer of gas from an old field to produce more gas from that field. Specifically they have an economic incentive to produce more wells in that field, infield drilling it is called, and this results in more production from the field. They also have an incentive to improve the productivity of wells. You can invest money in rehabilitation of a well if the market price you get for that gas is at a level with market levels.

Third, the abandonment pressure in a producing gas field is a very important factor. If the price you receive for the gas coming out of the ground is at one level, that determines what the abandonment pressure for that field will be. Of course, the higher the price for the gas that comes out of the field, the lower the abandonment pressure can be, and that results in more gas being produced from that field.

These three factors are responsible for what I have stated, namely that by deregulating natural gas prices we have the very good assurance from experts on all sides of the equation that we can bring into the energy supply of the country between 20 and 40 trillion cubic feet of natural gas which we otherwise will not receive.

By increasing the supply of natural gas to the energy base of the Nation, we back out of the energy usage equation of our energy system oil that is currently being used. That certainly is in the interest of this country. The largest single item of foreign purchases is oil for the economy of this country. Of the $150 billion negative trade balance with the rest of the world in 1985, better than $50 billion of it came from the purchase of oil. To the extent that we decrease the purchase of oil from foreign nations, to that extent we are improving the economic situation of the Nation in terms of its balance of trade.

Bear in mind also that for every $1 billion that we do not send to other countries for the purchase of energy means the production of about 25,000 jobs for the people in America. In other words, we can produce jobs for the people in this Nation by decreasing our dependence on foreign-supplied oil.

The recent decline in the price of oil presents us, I believe, with a sterling opportunity for deregulation of natural gas. This issue, of course, has been infected with partisan politics, regional politics, and I am happy to say that this legislation that is being introduced today enjoys the bipartisan support of Democrats and Republicans in this House, and I hope we can continue that bipartisan support because it is obvious that that is the only way we are going to be able to process this legislation to conclusion and place it on the President's desk for his signature.

The decline in oil prices has been facilitated because of an increased supply of oil. We have actually a surplus of natural gas on the market today. And because there is a surplus of natural gas, there is no crisis that compels us to do something or do nothing. And in this atmosphere today, I believe this is the best opportunity for moving forward with this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Louisiana if he has a comment he would like to share with respect to this issue.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I am very proud to coauthor this bill with the gentleman. This bill is the administration's bill. They have asked us to introduce it at their request. I am pleased to do so. I think this shows the administration is very concerned about the consumer, about national defense, and about the oil and gas industry, all three.

This bill also is somewhat of a victory as 2 weeks ago Congressman ARCHER of Texas and I introduced H.R. 4476, the Emergency Energy Act. This bill we are talking about here tonight that we introduced today does some of the same things that bill does. So I am pleased that the administration is supporting many of the same things.

Three of the things that this bill does, the main three things: first, as the gentleman has been describing, is that it has immediate decontrol of all new and renegotiated contracts for natural gas with a total lifting of all remaining price controls by April 1, 1987, including incremental pricing.

Second, it has open access to transportation through mandatory contract carriage by pipelines.

Third, it repeals the Fuel Use Act, which currently restricts the use of natural gas.

I happened to be in Congress and served on the committee the gentleman is now serving on, the Committee on Energy and Commerce, back in 1978 when the Carter administration had the Congress pass the Fuel Use Act. It was a mistake then. Many of us knew it. The industry knew it. Consumers now know it. It has been a mistake ever since. It needs to be repealed. This bill will do that.

Second, the deregulation bill that was passed in 1978 by the Carter administration, the Natural Gas Pricing and Policy Act, maintains, and people need to understand this, it really does not decontrol all of natural gas. About 50 percent of it remains with price controls on it forever. That is something not in the best interest of the consumer or certainly the industry itself. So what we are doing here is moving to remove two things passed during the Carter administration and do a third thing, and that is to provide for accessibility of gas.

This bill is important. We now know of the great difficulties that we are finding in the oil and gas industry, and I want to touch on a different slant. I agree with everything the gentleman said about the impact of this bill on consumers and the impact on jobs. The gentleman is totally correct. I want to take a little bit different slant and add a little bit to it.

Everybody understands the difficulty of the oil and gas industry today. Everybody understands that we do not want to get back into a position like we were in 1973, when we were totally dependent, or too much dependent, on foreign suppliers of our energy resources. That is what is going to happen if something is not done to be of some benefit to that industry as we are losing wells, we are losing companies, we are losing employees, we are losing facilities daily.

Gas is very important, and doing what this bill does to help gas will help preserve that industry. Better than 50 percent of the energy industry revenue, at least in Louisiana and in most parts of the country, is from natural gas. Fifty percent of the energy industry's revenue comes from gas.

Over 75 percent of the independent energy producers in Louisiana produce both gas and oil. Many times when you are out there exploring for one you find the other. That is why it is that way. Some of the most productive fields in the State of Louisiana are purely gas production fields. Therefore, when you realize how much revenue is coming into this industry from gas, anything we can do to improve the marketability of gas certainly will help that industry and help that industry's cash flow without any necessary increase in prices at all to the consumer.

New markets need to be opened up. As demand for natural gas drops, we are losing proven reserves. As an example, in 1983, Louisiana had better than 2 trillion cubic feet in proven reserves. That is more than the total production this year. As the price of oil drops, gas is becoming less competitive in limited markets available under current law. The industry estimates say that repeal of the Fuel Use Act, doing away with the current controls on natural gas, and increasing the accessibility for the transportation of natural gas will improve the marketability of natural gas from 20 to 25 percent. I want to repeat that. We can improve the marketability of natural gas, from the estimates I am getting, from 20 to 25 percent by simply doing the three things this bill does.

Gas is marginally profitable today. Industries are finding it more economical to switch to oil. This bill will help find new markets, transport to those markets and increase the value or the profit in going out and getting old gas back on stream that would be under regulation forever if this bill does not pass.

Louisiana produces 31 percent of all the domestic gas produced in this country, more than any other State in the Nation. Seventy-five percent of the gas produced in Louisiana is used outside the State of Louisiana. So producers can make this gas more available to 75 percent of the people outside of Louisiana who are using our gas if we can have that improved access to pipelines this bill gives, if we can repeal the Fuel Use Act so we can sell them gas for purposes that they want to use, that they cannot use it now except for the artificial provisions of the current law on the books.

Decontrol is also totally necessary. As I said earlier, 50 percent of all gas will stay regulated, and at the price it is regulated at, those wells need servicing, those wells need reworking, and you cannot do it at the price of gas that is being regulated today. So if that happens, those wells just stop producing gas and may be forever shut it, meaning we have that natural gas available for consumers that will never be made available for consumers. Consumers need to understand this. Decontrol does not necessarily mean higher prices for them. If we can produce more of that old gas, that will bring down the total market value somewhat. If we cannot produce that old gas because it is not profitable to do so, then the only gas they can buy is some of that newer gas decontrolled at a higher price.

So we believe, as does the administration, that decontrol of gas prices, plus opening up the access and transportation will, in fact, probably keep the prices stable with increased supply, and maybe even reduce the price somewhat to consumers.

We know what it will do for the industry. We had one source in Louisiana of independent producers that tells us they use the term, it will be of "unbelievable assistance" to natural gas producers in Louisiana at a time they need it the most.

Limited decontrol we have already seen will not work. It will not, but it has also not resulted in the skyrocketing prices to consumers, just like decontrol of oil did not result in skyrocketing prices to consumers. So I submit consumers have nothing to fear, while producers have everything to gain and hope for by the provisions of this bill.

As oil and gas companies can increase their natural gas production and exploration activities, this puts people to work in the oil and gas industry, as the gentleman has mentioned before. It also includes their cash-flow at a time they need it, putting them in a stronger financial position at present, and a stronger financial position to be able to last through the existing hard times through low oil prices.

It also has a positive effect on the petrochemical industries, something that has not been discussed. Petrochemical companies use natural gas as a feedstock. They would like to use it as a boiler fuel once again, so the repeal of the Fuel Use Act will allow them to do that.

We are about to lose many of these natural gas feedstock petrochemical companies overseas. They are moving to Saudi Arabia. We can help prolong that or prevent that by the activities of repealing the Fuel Use Act. It will allow them to use natural gas as a boiler fuel, which is important to them, but it also will prevent them from having their contracts abrogated when they buy natural gas as a feedstock by the existing laws which this bill repeals. It means when they sign a contract with a natural gas producer for natural gas to use as a feedstock to make chemicals from, there is no chance that is going to be abrogated, as it is under existing law, and take that gas away from them and take it somewhere else in the country in case of a shortage. So this will help the petrochemical industry as well.

We believe also, as indicated earlier, that any lower prices enjoyed by consumers would likewise be enjoyed by manufacturers, such as the petrochemical industry, keeping people to work, keeping us producing chemicals to sell in foreign trade to improve our deficit in foreign trade.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by simply saying this bill does some very necessary things to help consumers, to help the oil and gas industry which needs help, to help our national defense by keeping us energy independent, and also it certainly helps the economy of my State, which now, unfortunately, has achieved the status of being the highest unemployed State in the Union. This will help put people back to work in my State.

So I think that this is something that we need to do.

Mr. Speaker, let me just say to my good friend from California, who is the lead author on this bill, and I appreciate the gentleman working with me and having me with him on this bill, we have seen in the attack on Libya that there are a lot of allies in this world we cannot depend on; as a matter of fact, very darn few. Now, are we going to depend on those same people to help us get oil when we run out of oil or natural gas? I think we have learned a very valuable lesson. This Nation can never depend on anybody other than ourselves for national defense, and this Nation cannot ever depend on anybody but ourselves for production of energy. We have learned that, if nothing else, in that raid on Libya.

This bill will help us remain energy independent by repealing two totally worthless laws, the Fuel Use Act and the remaining provisions of natural gas price controls and, at the same time, clear up a third problem of not being able to have ready access to pipelines by natural gas producers to get their natural gas to market.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman. I am glad to join the gentleman. This bill is most worthwhile.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE] for those comments. I appreciate the gentleman's participation in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I have just some concluding comments that I would like to make.

The proponents of price control have told us that if we deregulated the price of oil, we consumers would expect to have a flareup in the price; that is, those producing the oil in the world and in the country would take advantage of the consumers of this Nation and stick it to them.

The facts have proved that to be just the opposite. In 1979, when Jimmy Carter was our President, he wisely began the deregulation of oil prices in America. The first thing President Reagan did when he was elected and began to serve as our President in 1981 was to complete at one time, in the beginning of 1981, the deregulation of all oil prices in this Nation.

We Americans now see what that wise policy decision has produced. We have decreased the quantity of oil this Nation is importing from foreign sources in 1986 as compared with what quantity we were importing in the late 1970's.

And, also, we have, actually as a result of the recent price decline in oil, witnessed the deregulation of oil prices. Rather than driving up oil prices for all consumers in this country, it has had the effect, along with other factors that could be a part of the monetary instability of our Nation and the Western World, but at least oil prices are significantly lower today, in 1986, than they were in 1981 or 1982 or 1983 or 1984 or indeed even in 1985.

The reason I mention this is because it has relevance with respect to the policy on natural gas. We were told again that if we deregulated natural gas prices to the extent that one-half of them by the National Gas Policy Act adopted in 1978, whereby about half of the prices of gas were deregulated effective January 1, 1985, that we would have a flareup of gas prices and we consumers would have to pay that. That did not prove to be the case. On January 1, 1985, we did not experience a flareup of gas prices in this Nation, nor do I think we would experience a flareup of gas prices in this Nation if we have the political courage to deregulate that gas in this Nation that is currently under price control, basically, 104 gas.

I think any layman—you do not have to be an economist to figure this out—knows that when you increase the supply of a product and the market is relatively the same, you are going to have a decline in price. It follows as night follows day. That is the very essence of this legislation. If we bring into the natural gas supply of this Nation an additional 20 to 40 trillion cubic feet, 1 to 2 years of additional supply that we will never get otherwise, I think it follows, as night follows day, that we are going to significantly drive down the price that we consumers have to pay for natural gas because the market force out there, that mysterious method by which automatically when buyers and sellers through the multimillion transactions that take place every day determine the price, we consumers have the best product at the lowest price and availability that can possibly be achieved. That is what the market system has done for the mystery and the benefit of the American consumer, and I submit that it is in the interest of all of us in this country to adopt the same policy with respect to natural gas prices.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today the financial difficulties of many farm borrowers and their lenders are more severe than any encounted since the Great Depression. More than one-third of our Nation's commercial-sized family farms continue to experience serious financial problems. If we do not deal with the farm debt crisis now, we will continue resolving it through foreclosures, bankruptcies, and bank failures. If the agriculture economy sees a cascading rate of failures due to overburdened credit, the taxpayer and the Nation will be assessed in many ways—not the least of which will be through FDIC guarantees.

Last year, the administration vetoed legislation initiated by our committee on immediate farm credit relief. The problems that our farmers have been struggling with for the last 5 years have not disappeared. The magnitude of the crisis has only grown worse and has had rippling affects on other sectors of our economy. Many communities are faced with a loss of population, declining property values, tax revenue, and public services. The outlook appears worse instead of bettter. Time is of the essence and inaction is clearly not the solution.

The new farm bill was designed to make U.S. farm products more competitive on world markets by making sharp reductions in loan rates. But, the results have been less than encouraging. Little improvement is expected in the export market. This year, agricultural revenues are projected to hit their lowest level in 8 years—over a 34-percent decline since their peak. The problems facing U.S. farmers are compounded by the fact that world grain reserves are at record levels and bumper crop harvests have kept commodity prices low.

To make matters worse, the value of the farmland that farmers use as collateral for their loans has continued to decline—compounding farmers' financial problems. Many farmers already burdened with high debt loads are being turned down for new operating loans by lenders worried about the prospects for recovery. Turned down by commercial lenders, many farmers have sought relief from the Farmers Home Administration, as the lender of last resort. But, the Agency has been unable to fulfill the flood of loan applications and reported in March that it ran out of money for new direct planting loans this year. As an interim measure, the Agency shifted limited funds into the direct loan program, but only through drawing down other FmHA loan accounts.

Not only are our farmers in for another dismal year, but farm banks are increasingly more vulnerable—as thousands of farmers will be unable to service their debt. Scores of agricultural banks are already in grim shape. The FDIC reported that net loan losses at agricultural banks nearly tripled over the past 2 years and that about 40 percent of the problem banks are farm banks. Sixty-two farm banks failed last year—the highest number of failures since the depression. This year, another 60 farm banks are expected to fail. Farm bank problems and failures will continue, unless immediate action is taken.

I was encouraged to learn of the recommendations that the three bank regulatory agencies recently proposed in bank accounting rules to allow banks to deal with losses incurred by troubled farm and energy loans. While this action is a step in the right direction, I am concerned that there is no mechanism to translate assistance down to the farm borrower.

We in Congress have a responsibility to deal with these problems now. That is why the bill that I am offering today is so important. This bill would establish a 3-year program of financial incentives for banks, other commercial lenders, and the Farm Credit System to reduce the interest rates and principal on existing loans to financially troubled farmers. This bill encourages lenders to use these liberalized accounting rules to restructure troubled farm debt by providing a matching interest subsidy program to lenders that reduce principal by a least 15 percent. The interest subsidy would be up to 6 percent—2 percent from the Federal Government, 2 percent from individual States, whose participation would be optional, and 2 percent from the lender.

Borrowers, lenders, and the Government must share the responsibility for fixing the present credit problems. Banks and other lenders can do much on their own to lighten the debt burden of their customers—and lenders have indicated a willingness to do this. But, many banks have been reluctant to write down loans or grant other concessions to borrowers because of the effect this might have on their capital levels. Federal assistance is needed to provide the mechanisms and incentives to lenders to work with borrowers to effect long-term restructuring of problem debt.

This bill also addresses the problem where the availability of new accounting rules does not necessarily ensure that they will be utilized. A case in point involves the Financial Accounting Standards Board Statement (known as the FASB No. 15 program). Although the FASB No. 15 program is now on the books, adequate notice was not provided to lenders—as evidenced by the fact that the majority were unaware that such a mechanism exists. we must act to ensure that lenders, examiners, and farm borrowers are fully aware of all available restructuring options. This bill would require lenders to develop debt restructuring guidelines and give borrowers an opportunity to participate in such a plan before action could be taken on defaulted loans.

My goals are simple. We need a program that is a solution for our farmers—not simply a bailout of an institution or a bank. This bill is designed to give farmers and their lenders an opportunity to restructure their debts and to stay in business. It is a reasonable and fair approach. It does not "bail out" anyone; instead it gives farmers and their lenders an opportunity to walk together out of a problem they entered into together. We must act now to prevent huge loan defaults that could shake confidence in the Nation's financial system, causing interest rates to rise and slowing the growth of income and jobs. This bill would help to restore the confidence on the main streets and among the farmers of rural America.

Mr. Speaker, I include the section-by-section analysis in the RECORD, along with the text of the bill:

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT OF 1986—SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

TITLE I: INTEREST SUBSIDY INCENTIVES FOR RESTRUCTURED LOANS

Section 101: General provisions

To encourage farm debt restructuring, this Act provides a matching interest subsidy program to lenders that reduce principal on troubled farm loans by at least 15%. As an added benefit, such debt restructuring would also allow lenders to participate in FmHA's Debt Adjustment Program (DAP). Under the DAP, loans that are restructured by at least 10% are eligible for a 90% FmHA guarantee.

From the date Act is enacted, borrowers have a one-year period in which they can apply to their lenders to participate in this three-year program. Loans that lenders have restructured during a six month period prior to enactment of this act would also be eligible for the interest subsidy.

Section 102: State and Federal interest rate payments

Interest rate subsidies would be provided to qualified lenders through the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA). State participation is optional.

Section 103: Principal and interest rate reduction

Up to 6 points of interest could be written down for those loans in which principal is reduced by at least 15%. The interest subsidy consists of 2% Federal, 2% State (participation is optional), and 2% Lender. For each additional 5% reduction in principal, one point of interest subsidy would be waived. The following table illustrates the incentive program:

Principal reduction [1]	Interest subsidy contribution			Total interest write-down (percent)
	Federal (percent)	State [2] (percent)	Lender (percent)
10 percent	([3])	([3])	([3])	([3])
15 percent	2	2	2	6
15 percent to 20 percent	2	2	1	5
20 percent to 25 percent	2	2	0	4

[1] In lieu of a principal reduction, lenders could reduce interest on fixed rate loans to acheive a comparable payment reduction over the life of the loan.
[2] State participation is optional. If State does not participate, total interest write-down would be reduced by 2 percent.
[3] Qualifies for 90 percent FmHA guarantees under DAP.

Section 104: Duration of interest rate reductions

At the end of this 3 year program, the interest rate charged on the restructured loan cannot exceed the standard rate charged by the lender for a comparable loan.

Section 105: Recapture provisions

In the event of non-monetary default (violation of non-monetary terms of loan agreement without lender's consent), the lender may enforce the terms of the loan as they existed before restructuring occurred.

Section 106: Limitation on foreclosure

Requires lender to develop debt restructuring guidelines for farm borrowers and give them the opportunity to participate in debt restructuring program before taking action on a defaulted loan. This would not apply to loans under jurisdiction of bankruptcy court.

If a lender should foreclose on a participating borrower, the federal and state interest subsidy would be cancelled.

Section 107: Use of certain funds

Authorizes the Secretary to use the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund to carry out this Act. Provides the Secretary with discretionary authority to use funds authorized under the interest subsidy program in the Farm Bill.

TITLE II: CONSERVATION PROVISIONS

Amends Section 1211 and 1212 of Food Security Act of 1985 to provide that any producer that cultivates highly erodible lands and wetlands will be ineligible for assistance under this Act.

TITLE III: ACCOUNTING PROVISIONS

Section 301: Federal regulation of the accounting for restructured agricultural loans

Subsections(j)(1-5) Agricultural Loan Restructuring

Amends the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide lenders with more flexibility to restructure troubled agricultural debt—by minimizing effects of capital erosion and lending limitations. The following amendments are consistent with those proposed by the bank regulatory agencies in March:

(B) Capitol Forbearance—requires each Federal banking agency to establish a capital forbearance program for banks that have experienced a reduction in capital which is largely attributable to problems in the agricultural sector. Under such a program, a bank would be allowed to operate under relaxed capital requirements, provided they can demonstrate capacity to restore capital within five years. Currently, banks falling below the minimum 6% capital level are subject to stringent enforcement action by bank examiners.

(C) "Call Report" Modifications—requires the Federal banking agencies to amend description of the status of restructured "troubled" loans in the Reports of Condition and Income (call reports). This requirement allows banks to distinguish loans that, although restructured (as under FASB #15), are in compliance with modified terms. Those loans would no longer need to be included in the category of nonperforming loans but could be disclosed in the call report as "Restructured and in Compliance With Modified Terms" or a similar description.

Subsection (j)(6) Limitation on Foreclosure

Requires lenders to develop debt restructuring guidelines for farm borrowers and given them the opportunity to participate in debt restructuring program before taking action on a defaulted loan. This would not apply to loans under jurisdiction of bankruptcy court.

Subsection (j)(7) Recapture Provisions

In the event of non-monetary default (violation of non-monetary terms of loan agreement without lenders' consent), the lender may enforce the terms of the loan as they existed before restructuring occurred.

Subsection (j)(8) Definitions

With the exception that this Section only applies to banks that have their deposits insured by the FDIC, the definitions are basically the same as those listed under Section 404.

Section 302: Modification of lending limitations for lenders that restructure agricultural loans

Amends regulations that establish lending limits for national banks so that a temporary reduction in capital would not reduce banks' lending authority. Currently, a decline in capital results in a parallel decline in the bank's maximum lending limit. By establishing an increased lending limit, a bank participating in the capital forbearance program who suffers moderate losses on agricultural loans could maintain its current dollar lending limits.

Section 303: Regulation of the accounting for restructured agricultural loans by State insured depository institutions

Requires appropriate State banking agency to amend State regulations to conform to amendments in Section 301.

Section 304: Adjusting real estate holding periods for a National Banking Association

Increases the number of years that national banks can hold real estate, from 5 to 10 years. Currently, a bank must dispose of farmland it acquired through foreclosures within five years unless the Comptroller of the Currency approves the possession for an extended period not to exceed an additional five years. This provision is intended to relieve any further downward pressure on already depressed farmland values.

TITLE IV: MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 401—Authorizes the Secretary to issue regulations to implement this Act within 30 days after the date of enactment.

Section 402—This section clarifies that the requirement for fixed rate mortgages in any restructured loan supersedes any state law.

Section 403—Provides for penalties under 18 U.S.C. 3623 or imprisonment for up to five years for those who steal, forge, misapply, etc., under this act.

Section 404: Definitions

"Agricultural Loan"—any loan made to finance production of agricultural products or livestock; or secured by agricultural property.

"Debt Restructuring"—loans restructured by any combination of: repayment period extension, interest rate reduction, principal reduction, or asset restructuring that would be accomplished over a ten year period.

"Qualified Agricultural Debt"—borrowers are limited to a $500,000 aggregate loan participation in the case of an individual and $600,000 in all other agricultural operations.

"Qualified Borrower"—is any person that has made at least 50 percent of its gross income from farming in four of the past five years; has gross annual sales of at least $30,000 during three of the previous five years, and total net income not to exceed $100,000; is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest on agricultural loan; can demonstrate an ability to repay loan if debt is restructured.

"Qualified Lender"—any commercial bank, savings and loan association, credit union, insurance company, or farm credit institution.

"Qualified State Institution"—any State chartered depository institution that has deposits insured or guaranteed under State law.

H.R. 4609

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

THE McCURDY PROPOSAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly disappointed in the action of the House today in not allowing us the opportunity to vote on the McCurdy proposal. I believe all sides should put the political rhetoric behind us and work toward a tough but thoughtful policy that says—to firend and foe alike—that America will not compromise our security or our principles.

Last year, I joined the McCurdy group in supporting nonmilitary aid to the Contras. Essentially, we felt it wasn't sufficient for Democrats simply to be against everything—we felt we had an obligation to say what we were for!

What we were for last year—and what we are still for—is a two-track policy toward the Sandinistas—a policy which recognizes the sovereignty of Nicaragua—a country with whom we are not at war—and commits America to peaceful settlements of our differences.

But a policy which also makes it clear that we choose to walk softly because we are a government of laws. But we also carry a big stick! And we are prepared to use it if an adversary refuses to agree to conditions essential to peace and security.

By the way, this two-track proposal is not original with the McCurdy group. It originated 2 years ago with President Reagan's own Bi-Partisan Blue Ribbon Commission on Central America.

During last summer's debate on aid to the Contras, our group broke with the Democratic leadership and made an offer to the White House. We said: "If you will commit to walk softly, seeking a negotiated settlement with Nicaragua, we will commit to making the necessary votes available, so you've got the big stick, if diplomatic efforts fail."

That offer was accepted. We were given a written commitment, signed by President Reagan, that a negotiated settlement would be given priority over a military solution, and that the United States would be an active partner in the Contadora regional peace effort. Relying on that written commitment, our group provided the swing vote for the aid to the Contras.

Unfortunately, no serious effort was made to honor that commitment, and we are now back at the same point as last summer, except the stakes are higher.

Our group's position today is basically the same as last summer. We insist that priority be given to an effort at a negotiated settlement. But if it becomes clear that the Sandinistas won't negotiate, we'll provide the votes for military aid to the Contras.

But there is one difference. Based on last year's experience, we want to see the negotiations take place before we vote the military aid.

None of us thinks the Sandinistas will negotiate themselves out of office.

But we can negotiate conditions which will assure a pluralistic society—in which the Sandinistas will be required to compete in free elections with other political parties whose platforms are based on free enterprise and traditional religious values.

And we can negotiate conditions which assure peaceful relations with neighboring countries.

And we can negotiate onsite verification by an international observer team stationed in Nicaragua.

We believe that when Marxism has to compete with free enterprise in free elections, the people of Nicaragua will reject it, just as people have rejected it in numerous other countries.

One final point: America's biggest advantage over the Soviets is not military; it is a moral advantage.

We are a government of laws—we have a tradition of respecting the rights and sovereignty of other nations. We don't have to explain a Czechoslovakia or a Hungary.

President Reagan himself made this point in his radio address on March 29:

American power, so long as it is used wisely and justly, is an undying symbol of hope to oppressed peoples around the world.

But this moral advantage carries with it a corresponding burden. When we disregard another nation's sovereignty, or support an unjust war, the rest of the world notices. And we lose more, in terms of integrity, than we gain, in terms of military advantage.

That's what the Contadora Group is telling us, and that's what our own Bi-Partisan Commission on Central America told us 2 years ago.

The McCurdy amendment assures the American people and the rest of the world that if American military power is used in Nicaragua, that will only happen after all peaceful alternatives have been explored!

If we go forward with military aid without the McCurdy amendment, we will be adopting a dual standard—walk softly when dealing with people with power, but use the big stick to crush disargeement from people without power. As this standard becomes clear. America's moral advantage will be lost—along with our integrity.

Sooner or later, the House will get back to the question of militrary aid to the Contras. When it does, I urge both parties to take a second look at the McCurdy compromise. It is not a dispute over a minor technicality: its point is central to what this country stands for.

By Mr. ARMEY:

SENATE—Wednesday, April 16, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 8, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

O Lord, You have searched me and known me.
You know my sitting down and my rising up;
You understand my thought afar off.
You comprehend my path and my lying down,
And are acquainted with all my ways.
For there is not a word on my tongue,
But behold, O Lord, You know it altogether.
You have hedged me behind and before,
And laid Your hand upon me.
Such knowledge is too wonderful for me;
It is high, I cannot attain it.
—Psalm 139:1-6.

Loving Father, in days like these, we reach our extremity easily. With the wisest and strongest there is ambivalence, second-guessing, uncertainty, even confusion. Some cover their ambivalence with strong language, and often it seems that the only ones who are cocksure and dogmatic are those who do not bear the burden of decision. Lord God, manifest Your wisdom, power, grace, and love in this place today. In the private sanctuary of each heart and mind, make Yourself known, lead us individually and collectively in Your way. To the glory of Your name we pray. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able majority leader, Senator DOLE, is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, followed by special orders for Senators HAWKINS, CRANSTON, SPECTER, BIDEN, MCCONNELL, CHILES, PROXMIRE, and METZENBAUM for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

At 11 o'clock, under the provisions of rule XXII, a live quorum will begin, to be immediately followed by a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to S. 1774, the Hobbs Act. If cloture is invoked, it will be the intention of the majority leader to remain on the motion to proceed for the remainder of the day.

If cloture is not invoked, the Senate could turn to any of the following items: S. 1236, technical amendments to the crime bill; S. 2231, Federal Deposit Insurance Act, or its companion, H.R. 4551; S. 1923, the bankruptcy judges bill; and any Executive Calendar nominations that appear on the calendar. We can also expect to resume consideration of S. 426, the hydroelectric relicensing bill.

So I would suggest that there will be rollcall votes today, the first one will come sometime after 11 o'clock, between 11 and 11:30. There will be rollcall votes throughout the day. Hopefully we can dispose of the hydroelectric relicensing bill.

I indicate to those who have concerns about the budget that we are having a meeting today on the budget to see whether or not there is some way to at least get started on the budget process. We know that we have missed the deadline. We know that the deadline is important. We hope that the House would respond and would at least report out a budget resolution from the Budget Committee.

But, in any event, we certainly have not lost sight of the importance of the budget resolution. I advise all of my colleagues on either side of the issue that it is still our hope to move as quickly as we can on that very important matter.

Mr. President, I reserve the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.)

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I simply want to state again that I hope the distinguished majority leader will call up the budget resolution very, very soon. Yesterday was the deadline, I believe, the April 15 deadline, when all the work on the resolution was to have been finished, including the conference and the subsequent actions by both Houses.

CONTINUED SALT II COMPLIANCE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wrote President Reagan last week outlining my position on the question of continued adherence by the United States to the terms of the unratified SALT II accords. May I say that I have some mixed feelings on this matter. Where treaties are entered into between or among nations, with our own country having agreed to a treaty, I feel that the constitutional role of the Senate should not be averted or avoided.

In this particular instance, with SALT II, I have joined with others on both sides of the aisle in supporting a no-undercut policy up to this time, but, as I said in discussing this with other Senators, and very recently, especially, with Senator NUNN, I am concerned that we have set a precedent which, in the future, could come back to haunt us. Because if treaties can be agreed to by the Executive and the Senate's constitutional role be circumvented, then I think that the Senate will have been recreant in its duties and responsibilities in not insisting that such treaties be sent to the Senate, hearings be conducted thereon, and action one way or the other be taken by the Senate, to approve or disapprove the resolution of ratification. Many treaties have been retained by the Senate over a period of many years with no action having been taken thereon.

I believe that, normally, it is not a good thing for the Senate to urge compliance with the provisions of any treaty which has not had the Senate's formal approval by a two-thirds vote. That road can lead to the surrender of the Senate's constitutional role in the treaty-making process.

And so it does give me pause and it troubles me to advocate that our Government should live up to a treaty which has never been acted upon by the Senate. Yet, I have been urging a no-undercut policy.

I have indicated to the President that I believe continuation of the so-called no-undercut policy by his administration, through the end of this calendar year 1986, is in our national security interests.

In this instance, I feel that there is justification for our continuation of a no-undercut policy.

At this time, I think it is in the security interests of the United States that we adhere to the treaty's provisions until the end of this year. But I must say, and I say again, that I am troubled by the failure of the Senate to insist upon fulfilling its constitutional role in regard to treaties.

This reflects a consistent position on my part, as well as on the part of a majority of my colleagues, since the Senate voted to support the no-undercut policy last June by a vote of 90 to 5.

In supporting the no-undercut policy, I and others endorse the proposition that the United States should not exceed the SALT II limits on ballistic missiles carrying multiple warheads [MIRV's] and bombers carrying cruise missiles. Thus, as new Trident submarines are placed into service, equivalent launchers from older systems, be they land based or sea based, would have to be dismantled.

Last year, President Reagan chose to dismantle an older Poseidon submarine to honor those limits when a new Trident boat, the U.S.S. Alaska, began sea trials.

Similar action would be required when the eighth Trident boat, the U.S.S. Nevada, undergoes sea trials next month.

Many of my colleagues, led by Senator BUMPERS, Senator LEAHY, and Senator CRANSTON, signed a letter of support for the no-undercut policy. In doing so, my colleagues advocated the dismantlement of two additional Poseidon boats to comply with the SALT II limits this spring.

Others of my colleagues prefer the dismantlement of more vulnerable land-based Minuteman missiles. I, myself, reserve judgment on the appropriate method of complying, but I think it is important to note that there is a clear bipartisan majority in the Senate at this time which supports continued U.S. compliance with the SALT II limits.

Before explaining my reasons for this decision, I wish to set the record straight on a matter related to the history of the SALT II treaty. On February 26, 1982, President Reagan delivered a televised address—or it may have been in a news conference. My memory is not entirely clear on this point. In any event, he made a statement, which has since been quoted frequently, that "President Carter had to abandon the treaty"—meaning the SALT II treaty—"because Senate leaders of his own party wouldn't support it * * *"

Mr. President, that statement by the President is absolutely, positively, and incontrovertibly not correct—not correct. It is entirely incorrect. As the majority leader at that time, I examined the provisions of the SALT II treaty very carefully after it was submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent. I was not wholly satisfied with everything in it but, on balance, I felt it would enhance our national security. I publicly announced my support for it.

I read every line of the hearings that were conducted by both the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee. This was not one of those instances of lesser moment in which I might ask my staff to read a printed copy of committee hearings and give me a memorandum summarizing the contents. I personally read every word just as I read every word in the case of the Panama Canal treaties.

I was not greatly impressed by the SALT II treaty. It gave me a great deal of difficulty to make a decision. But, finally, I came down on the side of going forward with the SALT II treaty, taking it up, debating it in the Senate, and I think I may have said on one or two occasions, well, it is about a 49–51 ratio with me. The scale is tipped in the direction of its being in our own country's best interests overall.

If I could have written it, it would have been much different, of course, as any Senator probably would say and certainly could say.

But I came down on the side of the treaty, stated so publicly, and worked toward having the treaty approved in this body.

It was only when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in late December 1979 that I talked to President Carter and told him it would be impossible to secure Senate approval.

As majority leader, may I say to my very distinguished friend, Mr. BIDEN of Delaware, to my equally distinguished friend, Mr. CRANSTON, and the distinguished Senator from Mississippi who is presiding over the Senate, I went to Moscow, went down to the Crimea, and talked to President Brezhnev on that occasion. I was allowed to have one aide with me. That aide was Hoyt Pervis, who is now teaching at the Universtiy of Texas. President Brezhnev had one aide, and each of us had an interpreter.

Upon that occasion, may I say to the distinguished Senator from California, I went alone, I had 1½ hours or 2 hours of discussion with President Brezhnev. I told him of my support for the treaty, and I told him the reason for my mission to the Soviet Union; that was, to urge Soviet leaders and the Soviet press to stop making threats in an attempt to intimidate the United States Senate, saying, in essence, that if the Senate does not approve this treaty, this will happen or that will happen—dire threats.

I said to Mr. Brezhnev:

The Senate will not be intimidated, and the Senate is not a rubber stamp for any President of the United States. And I urge that such critical statements be discontinued lest they destroy the very, very slim chance of the U.S. Senate's voting to approve the ratification of the treaty.

So there should be no question but that I supported that treaty.

It was when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December 1979 that I then talked to President Carter and told him that it would be impossible to secure Senate approval in the atmosphere that then prevailed; namely, the holding of hostages by the Iranians and the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviets.

I said to Mr. Carter, there was not the slightest chance that the Senate would approve the ratification of that treaty—not the slightest chance, with invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet military forces, we could not hope to get the two-thirds vote. I suggested that we stop our efforts in that direction. The President agreed, and said he would write a letter to me for the RECORD so stating.

Mr. President, my fundamental reason for advocating a continuation of adherence to the SALT limits for at least the remainder of 1986 is simple but critical. It would redound more to the advantage of the Soviet Union than the United States if we broke through the launcher limits.

It seems likely to me that the Soviet Union would use that event as a pretext to break through the SALT II limits on central strategic systems, particularly land-based MIRV'ed ICBM's.

Because of the size of the Soviet inventory of these menacing weapons, and the capability of the Soviet production base to add to that inventory, it is quite clear that the Soviets are more capable of expanding their operational strategic weapons inventory far more quickly than we are. Therefore, for the United States to give the Soviets a rationale and a justification for ignoring the SALT II limits would result in a quantitative shift in the balance of forces against the United States in the near future.

Second, Mr. President, at the same time that the Soviet Union could outstrip us in deploying new strategic weapons, they could argue that it was the fault of the United States that the arms race had taken a new turn. I beleive that this inevitable aggressive Soviet public relations campaign would place us on the defensive in the ongoing competition for supportive world opinion for our arms control proposals.

Mr. President, the United States, together with our NATO allies, has had a very notable success in meeting the challenge thrown down by the Soviet Union as a result of its deployment of intermediate-range ballistic missiles in the European theater. The resulting NATO decision to respond with a two-track approach, encompassing both a NATO Euromissile deployment schedule and negotiations with the Soviets aimed at withdrawing the SS-20's, has been extremely successful. NATO has hung together in weathering difficult political opposition to our Euromissile deployment and this demonstration of resolve is a key reason why the Soviets are now back at the negotiating table in Geneva.

Mr. President, recent proposals and counterproposals by both superpowers on the matter of medium-range missiles in Europe have raised hopes that progress might be made on this matter this year. I hope that the firm outlines of an equitable agreement on the Euromissile question can be developed as a result of the administration's latest offer in Geneva in this area. But it should be borne in mind by my colleagues that, if a successful arms control agreement is achieved on Euromissiles, it will have been because NATO stood together.

It appears obvious to me, Mr. President, that the views of our NATO partners on arms control matters must be accorded significant weight in our decisionmaking process. Therefore, I asked the Congressional Research Service to undertake a fresh assessment of the specific views of our allies so as to help guide the Senate in this matter. That assessment is now ready, and I ask unanimous consent that it appear in its entirety in the RECORD at the end of my address.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in summary, the assessment finds that: First, NATO governments believe that abandoning the SALT II limits would be more advantageous to the Soviets than to the United States, in terms of relative potential to add nuclear weapons systems and with regard to international political reactions; second, NATO governments still strongly favor continued U.S. compliance with SALT II and remain unconvinced that Soviet violations cited by the administration warrant suspending that compliance. They believe questionable Soviet practices should not be ignored, but the United States should continue compliance so long as western security is not prejudiced; third, NATO governments oppose adoption of gray-area noncompliance formulas, such as drydocking Poseidon submarines, instead of dismantling them, when new U.S. Trident boats begin sea trials; and, fourth, NATO governments are concerned that a U.S. move away from SALT II would sour the political climate for a summit meeting, and compound the damage to U.S. prestige before world opinion which the allies believe has been caused by the nuclear testing controversy.

The United States has legitimate concerns over Soviet compliance with the provisions of existing arms control agreements, including the ABM Treaty, as well as limits of the unratified SALT II accords. I indicated in very clear terms to Mr. Gorbachev last September, when I led a Senate delegation to Moscow, that the U.S. Senate is very serious over compliance with the spirit, as well as the specific provisions, of arms control treaties.

I agree completely with the statements in the Bumpers-Leahy letter to the President in this regard, that in "order to maintain the integrity of those agreements and facilitate reaching a new agreement, the Soviets should be pressed to take positive steps to resolve our concerns." However, these concerns should not cause us to overlook the benefits to our overall national security of continuing the "no undercut" of SALT II policy in 1986.

It is because of these benefits to our security that I support this continuation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter to the President last week be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXHIBIT No. 1

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE,
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, DC, April 4, 1986.

To: The Honorable Robert C. Byrd, U.S. Senate, Attn.: Peter Lennon.

From: Stanley R. Sloan, Specialist in U.S. Alliance Relations, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division.

Subject: The NATO Allies and the Issue of Continued U.S. Observance of SALT II Limits.

Last year at your request I prepared an assessment of the attitude of NATO governments toward continued U.S. compliance with SALT II constraints. This memorandum is in response to your recent request to examine this issue again, and to highlight any new or changed considerations, in view of the forthcoming U.S. decision on continued SALT II compliance prompted by the scheduled sea trials in May 1986 of the eighth Trident submarine, Nevada. As with last year's assessment, this analysis reflects the results of discussions with officials in the embassies of principal NATO allies in Washington, D.C.; these consultations occurred during the period April 1-3, 1986.

THE NATO ALLIES AND THE ISSUE OF CONTINUED U.S. OBSERVANCE OF SALT II LIMITS [1]

Allies still favor compliance

Discussions in April 1986 with authoritative representatives of major NATO governments in Washington lead to the conclusion that the NATO allies still strongly favor continued U.S. compliance with the terms of the SALT II accord. The spokesmen say their governments would deeply regret steps by the United States that could be interpreted as violating or undermining that U.S.-Soviet understanding. According to these officials, the following generalizations describe their national positions.

The NATO allies hope that the United States and the Soviet Union will observe some restraint in their nuclear weapons programs while negotiations aimed at achieving a new limitations accord are underway.

The allies remain unconvinced that Soviet violations of arms control accords cited by the Reagan Administration warrant suspending observance of SALT II constraints. They believe that questionable Soviet practices should not be ignored, but they feel that the United States should hold the high moral ground on this issue by continuing to observe treaty constraints, so long as this posture does not prejudice Western security interests.

NATO governments therefore oppose adoption of gray-area non-compliance formulas, such as simply dry-docking Poseidon submarines (which they would regard as a breach of SALT II obligations) instead of disabling them as SALT-countable nuclear delivery systems when the next Trident submarine begins sea trials in May 1986.

In any case, NATO governments believe that dispensing with SALT II constraints would be more advantageous to the Soviet Union than to the United States, both in terms of relative potential over the next several years to add nuclear delivery vehicles to current inventories and with regard to international political reactions.

Specific sources of concern

Last year, the NATO governments feared that a U.S. decision to undercut SALT II constraints would reduce prospects for a U.S.-Soviet arms control agreement in Geneva. This year, they are similarly concerned that a U.S. move away from SALT II would sour the political climate for a U.S.-Soviet summit meeting in 1986 as well as close the door to any nuclear arms control agreement for the remainder of the Reagan Administration. In addition, they believe that the Soviet Union has taken the high ground on the issue of nuclear weapons testing with its unilateral testing moratorium, and that a U.S. decision to undercut the SALT II regime would compound the damage to U.S. prestige before world public opinion.

Some European governments may also be concerned about the internal political repercussions of the U.S. decision. The Christian Democratic government in Bonn and the Conservative government in London both face formidable political challenges from opposition parties in elections scheduled next year. Arms control positions will not likely be the major issues in those elections—economic issues and personal popularity may be the big factors in both cases. And, the British and West German governments do not disagree with the major opposition parties about the importance of maintaining the SALT II framework. But in a close contest, the opposition parties may get some political mileage from accusing the incumbents of not effectively representing their national views to Washington. Both German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher have made much out of their influence with the Reagan administration, and a decision by the United States to undercut the SALT II regime would tarnish this image of influence for the current West German and British governments.

In the nearer term, the Dutch government, having moved toward deployment of new intermediate-range nuclear systems (ground-launched cruise missiles) over substantial popular and parliamentary opposition, faces a strong electoral challenge from the opposition Labor Party in elections to be held this May. A U.S. retreat from SALT

[1] Prepared by Stanley R. Sloan, Specialist in U.S. Alliance Relations, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division, April 4, 1986.

II could be used by Labor to argue that the current center-right coalition's policy of cooperation with Reagan Administration policies has undermined arms control prospects and fueled the arms race.

European restraint

As was noted last year, in spite of their strong concerns, the European allies will not intrude openly in the U.S. decisionmaking process. They are making their views known to the administration through official channels, hoping to encourage continued U.S. compliance with the SALT II regime. And, as was also noted last year, should the United States decide to suspend or modify SALT II compliance, NATO governments probably would attempt to minimize the political impact on the alliance, moderating their critique in public statements and masking the true depth of their concern about the domestic political impact and the consequences for the arms control process as well as for overall East-West relations.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As you consider the national security issues raised by the impending sea trials of our newest Trident submarine, USS Nevada, I want to urge you to continue, through 1986, U.S. policy refraining from actions undercutting existing strategic arms agreements, if the Soviets show similar restraint.

I am making this recommendation because of the compelling evidence demonstrating that continuation of this policy clearly is in our overall national security interests because:

First, it constrains Soviet strategic weapons programs more than U.S. programs, thus limiting the Soviet nuclear threat to America and its allies;

Second, it promotes your efforts to achieve mutual and verifiable arms control agreements; and Third, it reinforces U.S. leadership within the NATO Alliance, and allied support for that leadership in this area. Our allies strongly supported your decision last June to continue U.S. compliance with SALT II, and they favor a continuation of that policy now.

The Senate twice last June voted overwhelmingly to endorse continued U.S. compliance with SALT constraints. Since then, there has been no major change in the strategic nuclear relationship between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. which would warrant abandoning that policy. In addition, U.S. abandonment of SALT II compliance would give the Soviets a pretext to take advantage of a superior strategic weapons production base to add many more new warheads to their arsenal than we could add to ours in the near future. At the same time, the Soviets undoubtedly would mount an aggressive propaganda campaign based on the claim that the U.S. is responsible for an accelerated arms race, placing us on the defensive in the ongoing competition for supportive world opinion for our arms control proposals.

Many of my Senate colleagues on both sides of the aisle have reached this same conclusion and have sent you a letter organized by Senators Leahy and Bumpers and signed by 52 Senators. This letter is a thoughtful and cogent expression of why it is in the overall military and arms control interests of the United States not to discard SALT constraints in 1986, and I know you will consider carefully the views expressed in it.

Finally, I wish to emphasize the particular importance placed by the NATO allies on our continuing to comply unambiguously with the provisions of SALT II when the USS Nevada begins sea trials. The Library of Congress, at my request, has prepared a new, objective assessment of allied perspectives on this issue, and the strength of our allies' sentiments on this matter is unmistakable in this special report. I am attaching a copy of this report for your consideration.

Please accept my appreciation in advance for your consideration of my views on this important national security issue.

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

SENATOR HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, this morning I shall read a statement by Senator HAWKINS relating to the drug problem. The statement reads as follows:

ANOTHER CHANCE FOR MEXICO TO MAKE GOOD ON ITS DRUG PROMISES

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, every weekend there is a strange ritual that takes place at the San Miguel Gate on the U.S.-Mexican border. The San Miguel Gate is a border crossing from Mexico into the Papago Indian Reservation in southern Arizona. From Friday afternoon to Sunday afternoon, the gate turns into a commercial "no-man's land" as Mexicans and Papago Indians gather for the "flea market," where food and clothing are sold, and jewelry, trinkets, and household items are traded in a fiesta atmosphere with music, singing, and dancing. There is strict obedience to the law of supply and demand and the principle of free enterprise is in full evidence. There is, however, a fly in the ointment; drugs and alcohol are openly traded with little restraint.

In February, the corrosive influence of drugs exploded in a violent manner. Glenn Miles, a U.S. Customs Service patrol officer and a Papago Indian, was gunned down as he tried to intercept three drug smugglers who were returning to Mexico. The 44-year-old Miles was on the 4 p.m.-to-midnight shift. He was part of a three-man patrol that normally worked together, but on this particular evening his two partners were in a separate car—they could cover more territory that way.

Miles radioed his partners that he had spotted three backpackers who he suspected were carrying drugs. Backpackers on the reservation are almost inherently suspect, particularly if their movements draw attention in any way. The reason for this cloak of suspicion is that backpackers can earn between $200 and $250 to lug a cargo of 60 to 100 pounds of marijuana across the border into the U.S. The marijuana is picked up on the American side and transported by car or truck to "stash houses" in Tucson, Arizona for shipment elsewhere in the U.S. About 15 minutes after Miles' first radio signal to his partners, he called again and was told that they were speeding to his aid. When the partners arrived, they found Miles' empty truck hidden behind a clump of bushes on a desolate stretch of the border, covered with dust, scrub brush, cactus, and tumbleweeds. One hundred yards away they found a light shining. It turned out to be Miles' flashlight, which had fallen to the ground beside his body. Miles had been hit several times with bullets from two different guns.

Commissioner William von Raab, of the Customs Service, believes that Miles was a victim of a new wave of drug trafficking along the border of the southwestern United States. The surge in trafficking there has occurred as cocaine and marijuana smugglers try new routes to bypass increased law enforcement in Florida and the Gulf Coast.

Officials say Colombians have moved into the southwest on both sides of the border and are involved in drug trafficking and smuggling illegal aliens into the U.S. Miles was gunned down about a mile from the San Miguel Gate on a Friday night in February and officials speculate that his slayers could easily have melted into the crowd at the "flea market" without attracting any attention.

The Customs Service has offered a $100,000 reward for information on the killers, and Commissioner von Raab says he is determined to find out who committed the dastardly act and bring them to justice.

One promising lead in the case has been three sets of tracks found by Miles' fellow Papago Customs officers, who employed the same tactics and skills their ancestors did in bygone years to hunt game and to track raiders from other Indian tribes. The tracks crossed near the San Miguel Gate at a point where a waist-high, barbed-wire fence separates the U.S. side of the Papago Reservation and Mexico. The Customs Service is being deliberately vague about the investigation except to give assurances that the leads are promising.

In the Miles case, marijuana smuggling by backpackers is thought to have been involved. The bulk of the cocaine trafficking in that area is done with low-flying planes. And the Customs Service is interested in ways to keep closer tabs on private aircraft flying back and forth between the U.S. and Mexico. One proposal, now under study by the Federal Aviation Administration, would limit the number of corridors through which small planes could fly. That, von Raab points out, would have the effect of banning light planes from routes preferred by drug runners and enable the Customs Service to concentrate its resources on suspect planes crossing the border.

Meanwhile, American and Mexican authorities are working together to solve the murder of Glenn Miles, a dedicated Customs official who worked hard and long hours to make this a better and safer world to live in. It is hoped that the level of cooperation we receive with the Mexican officials is greater than in the case of Enrique Camarena Salazar, the American DEA agent kidnaped, tortured, and killed more than a year ago. Several suspects are in custody, but not a single person has been brought to trial yet.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CRANSTON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

U.S. ACTION IN LIBYA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Congress was not advised about the Libyan action until it was underway. I have withheld comment on this very serious matter until I could be more thoroughly informed.

Terrorism is as despicable as war and it must be stopped. Failure to act after we had proof of Libyan terrorism would have given credence to the view that America lacks the will to stand up and fight against terrorism.

We sought economic and diplomatic action against Libya but our European allies refused to cooperate. The United States then had to act alone, and President Reagan chose to fight terrorism with military action.

I hope and pray that the President has embarked America on a course of action which will succeed in quelling terrorism. Unfortunately, we cannot expect that result soon. We must anticipate more violence.

I deeply regret that Americans—including Capt. Paul F. Lorence of San Francisco—are missing in action, and that Libyan civilians reportedly have been wounded and killed.

But let us not forget that Libyan terrorists have deliberately wounded and killed innocent civilians. They have done so purposely. We have sought to avoid doing so.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BIDEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time that was set aside for Mr. CHILES earlier be vitiated and given to the distinguished Senator from Delaware. I do this at the request of Mr. CHILES as far as vitiating the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE SALT II TREATY COMPLIANCE

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, as we have heard from the majority leader and the Democratic leader, the President will be meeting today with his top national security advisers to make a decision that will have a very significant impact on prospects for arms control. At stake is the survival of not only the unratified SALT Treaty, which has placed limits on United States and Soviet strategic forces since 1979, but, in fact, prospects for a necessary and critical arms control agreement in the next several years.

The SALT II Treaty has contributed to U.S. security since 1979, notwithstanding the fact we never formally ratified it. It has done that by substantially constraining the buildup of Soviet strategic offensive forces.

Since 1972 the Soviets have had to remove more than 1,000 land-based and 200 submarine-based ballistic missiles from their active forces. They have had to dismantle 13 Yankee-class ballistic-missile-carrying submarines. By contrast, the United States has had to remove fewer than half that number of land-based and submarine-based missiles, and only 11 submarines have been dismantled thus far.

Until now, the President has prudently chosen to abide by a policy of "interim restraint" as he referred to it. The Senate strongly endorsed that policy by a vote of 90 to 5 last June. But now some of the President's advisors are urging him to abandon that wise policy, arguing that Soviet violations of arms-control agreements cannot be ignored.

I agree that Soviet violations should not be ignored. But SALT II should not be expected to carry the baggage for all of arms control. And that is precisely the burden opponents of the SALT "no-undercut" policy are trying to impose on the agreement. They are focusing on the issue of violations because they want to break down existing arms control agreements and avoid being bound by any new ones.

The President should not give in to these pressures. The policy of not undercutting the existing arms control agreements sustains the vitally important process of arms control, which I must acknowledge is barely limping along. But, in fact, it is still a process.

In an unconstrained world the Soviets would be in a far better position to increase not only their missile totals but also their warhead totals.

We seem to forget about that here on the floor. My dear grandmother used to have an expression that I am sure we have all heard in various forms. She used to say, "Joey Joey, don't bite your nose off to spite your face."

Well, if we focus on what SALT II imposes on the Soviets and on what a no-SALT world allows the Soviets and allows us, we quickly come to the inescapable conclusion that an unconstrained nuclear situation would at this moment better serve the Soviet Union than it would the United States of America.

Not only would it allow, as I said, the Soviets to increase their missile totals, but also their warhead totals. That is what kills people.

Whether SALT II is perfect or imperfect—and I agree there is some imperfection—we could find ourselves in a far more imperfect world than we now live in without it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I certainly will.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator for his statement.

It is not true that the Soviets have a production base, in other words a hot line, prepared, in the case of breakthrough, to proceed more rapidly than we could proceed at the present time with the production of additional ballistic missiles with MIRV's? Are the Soviets not in a better position than we to quickly expand production in the event this treaty were to be cast aside?

Mr. BIDEN. The Democratic leader is correct. Yes, not only are they able to do that, but to put it in very simple terms for all of us to understand, and I know the Democratic leader understands this and all its sophisticated aspects very well, they have bigger missiles, they can add more warheads on top more quickly than we can, which means that they can add to their firepower, their destructive power, more rapidly and with more accuracy and with more consistency than we can now.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. May I ask one other question?

Mr. BIDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I apologize for injecting myself.

Mr. BIDEN. I am delighted to hear the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Would the distinguished Senator not agree with me that the political repercussions of undercutting this treaty by the United States at this time would cast a chill upon a future summit between the President and General Secretary Gorbachev and the negotiations toward an arms control accord?

Would it not give the Soviets an excuse to walk away from the summit as well as the negotiations which are being carried on in Geneva?

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, let me say that I think the Senator from West Virginia has put his finger on the single most significant aspsect of this whole discussion.

It is my view, as the Senator from West Virginia implied, that in concert with our refusal to stop testing of nuclear weapons, in concert with the overwhelming skepticism among friends and foe alike, that we, in fact, are not committed to arms control, this action would be read by the Soviets and others as a clear signal that the forces in this administration that have for 7 years argued against any arms contol agreement had prevailed.

It is no secret to any Member of this body, Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative, that, not unlike the last administration, there has been a battle going on internally within the administration between those who support a strong, independently verifiable arms control agreement, and those who do not want an arms control at all.

I say to my friend from West Virginia that I believe one of the most damaging aspects in a political sense to reneging on the "no undercut" policy would be that it would be read by the Soviets and other analysts that the forces within the administration who oppose any arms control agreement had prevailed.

That would be very damaging.

Mr. President, let me say to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia that I have no objection to its appearing as an interruption. It is an addition. It indicates that the minority leader has taken seriously my statement. I would be flattered to have it appear in the middle of my statement. It does not diminish it; it enhances it.

Let me take a few more minutes, if I may.

Mr. President, I once again submit that the President should not give in to the pressures as I have characterized them. The policy of not undercutting the arms control agreements sustains, as I indicated, the vitally important process of arms control.

While the Soviets have by and large abided by the quantitative limits of SALT II, the administration has charged them with violations in other areas, including the deployment of a second "new type" of land-based missile and the encryption of telemetry in missile tests. The administration has also repeatedly raised the issue of the construction of the Krasnoyarsk radar installation.

This construction at that location is one of some great concern to us, with good reason. It is not, however, relevant to the terms of the SALT II treaty.

I, and many of my colleagues, support a policy of "proportionate response" to instances of noncompliance.

Simply stated, if, in fact, the Soviets would in any way alter a specific provision of the treaty which is otherwise very much in our interest, it seems to me the wiser course is to respond in kind rather than vitiate the entire document. That is what I mean by proportionate response.

A proportionate response would allow the United States to develop the Midgetman missile as its second new system, but it would also allow us to fully comply otherwise unless the Soviets do not.

The telemetry encryption problem—simply stated, the way by which they prevent us from being able to know what they are doing in their testing—should be addressed through the Standing Consultative Commission. We all know that is the Commission established under SALT whereby we argue with one another about whether or not each side is keeping the letter and the spirit of the agreement. High-level diplomacy is another channel for dealing with such violations.

The Soviets must understand, however, that if they significantly impede our ability to verify their compliance with arms control agreements, it will not only make continued adherence to SALT II impossible, but will call into question all future arms control prospects, which would be extremely dangerous for the whole world.

When our eighth Trident submarine begins sea trials in late May, the United States will exceed the SALT II ceiling on launchers of MIRV'd ballistic missiles. Abandoning the treaty limits will endanger American national security. Abandoning two aging Poseidon submarines to comply with the treaty—which is the price we pay for compliance with the treaty—will not endanger American national security.

Therefore, Mr. President, I urge President Reagan to continue the course he has wisely set out on and to dismantle the Poseidon submarines, put the Trident to sea, which I support, continue to comply with the SALT II agreement, and get about the business of an arms control agreement.

I thank my colleagues and I thank Senator CHILES for allowing me the extra time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

PROPORTIONAL RESPONSE: THE WRONG WAY TO GO

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Delaware leaves the floor, let me say I greatly admire him. He is a wonderful Senator, would make a great President of the United States, but he is wrong on proportional response. This would gut the treaty and is the wrong way to go.

THE LESSON FROM LIBYA: CRACKDOWN ON THE SPREAD OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there has always been a powerful case for an all-out effort by this country to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. But now this country is virtually at war with Libya. We know Libya is led by an unpredictable, erratic tyrant. We know from sad experience that Colonel Qadhafi will use whatever military force he has at hand regardless of its terrible consequences for innocent civilians. Now, stop for a minute, and think of this situation. Suppose Qadhafi had nuclear weapons. Not strategic nuclear weapons, just small tactical nuclear weapons. Suppose Qadhafi had within his control a couple of hundred nuclear weapons small enough and light enough for terrorists to carry around in briefcases. A single terrorist could destroy a hundred thousand Americans at a football game, or at a busy intersection during the rush hour in any major American city.

One Libyan fanatic with a nuclear bomb in a suitcase a block away from the U.S. Capitol in Washington when the President of the United States is delivering his State of the Union Message could, at one stroke, destroy the President, the Vice President, the Supreme Court, the Joint Chiefs of Staff of our Armed Forces, the entire Cabinet of the President, the entire U.S. Senate, the House of Representatives, and the diplomatic corps. And the country would be decapitated. Every leader of our Federal Government would be gone. Does anyone really think that a person like Qadhafi on the basis of his record could resist such a tempting target, if he had the means at hand?

The President was right to order the strike against Libya that he ordered. There may have to be more such strikes. Will they end terrorism? No. Will they begin to reduce terrorism? That depends on whether this country can make the price of terroristic actions so high that states directing terrorism will recognize they are in a losing game.

Confronted with the possibility of using nuclear weapons to blow the head off the most powerful country in the world, the price might seem well worthwhile. But would not the sure retaliation, the devastating retaliation, from this country in response for such a terrible act assure that no Libya or Syria or Iran or any other country would initiate such an action?

Mr. President, the answer to this question is very important. Stop and consider it. If the spread of nuclear weapons continues, if the present 5 nuclear powers expands to 10 and then to 20 or 30, and if those powers include Syria, Iraq, Iran, North Korea, and Vietnam, we might have a very difficult, perhaps an impossible time determining whence came the nuclear explosion.

Colonel Qadhafi's threat and boasting are irritants. His open training of terrorists insults people throughout the world. But it greatly diminishes his force and effect. We can respond to the terrorist actions of this braggart with the approval of our country and of much of the world. But in a world with a number of nuclear armed countries directing terrorists, we might never have any clear and convincing proof which one was destroying our cities or wiping out our Government leadership.

Fortunately, the Soviet Union sees this problem much the way we do. They have been more consistently and effectively opposed to nuclear weapons proliferation than we have been. This country's recent careless agreement to sell nuclear powerplants to the People's Republic of China is precisely the kind of proliferation policy that we must stop. That agreement would permit the transfer to China of American nuclear powerplants that produce processed uranium of nuclear weapons grade.

Oh, sure it's true that China is already a nuclear weapons state. It already has ample sources of weapons grade plutonium and uranium. But we will now be selling a technology to China that they in turn can sell elsewhere, wherever they wish in the world. China has frequently assisted other countries interested in developing a nuclear arsenal. She has stated her opposition to the present exclusive monopoly on nuclear weapons by the United States, Russia, the United Kingdom, France, as well as China. China will not submit to international inspection or control by the International Atomic Energy Commission. Her leaders have refused to commit themselves either orally or in writing to desist from the resale of this nuclear technology that produces the essential raw material nuclear weapons.

Meanwhile, this country continues in its refusal to even try to negotiate an end to nuclear weapons testing. That testing seems certain to develop weapons that are smaller, lighter, cheaper, and more devastating than any nuclear weapon is now. This will be precisely what the Libyas of the world want and will find a way to secure once we have developed it.

Mr. President, this Senator is not talking theory. Colonel Qadhafi has reportedly attempted to purchase a nuclear weapon from various sources. He has, in fact, offered to fund development of a Moslem bomb.

So the Libyan experience should convince us that the time has come not only to crack down on Libya—the President is precisely right in doing this—the time has also come when we should crack down even harder on nuclear proliferation. It is no exaggeration to say that the survival of our country is at stake.

MYTH OF THE DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, my myth of the day is that we have made substantial progress in reducing unemployment since the spring of 1984.

Nothing could be further from the truth. It is surprising and unsettling to note that in spite of reports of economic growth over the past 3 years, March's unemployment figure of 7.2 percent is precisely the same as that in June 1984. With the growth in the labor force over the past 2 years, the actual number of unemployed persons has risen by 200,000. In the last year alone, manufacturing employment has fallen by 130,000.

Clearly, while the stock market traders may be getting rich, close to 8½ million Americans still cannot find jobs during this so-called economic expansion.

In addition, another 1.1 million Americans are so discouraged about finding work that they have given up and dropped out of the labor force. Still another 5.5 million Americans are working part time because full-time jobs are unavailable. Many of these people formerly were employed full time in high-paying jobs in our Nation's factories.

In other words, the poor performance of our Nation's labor markets since June 1984 has left 15 million American workers deeply disappointed.

Perhaps lower interest rates, cheaper oil, and a lower dollar will eventually result in an economic boom, but most labor market statistics have remained stuck at recession levels for close to 2 years.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLURE). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings on the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

S. 2312—ARMED CAREER CRIMINAL ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I introduce today a bill to broaden the scope of the Armed Career Criminal Act, which was signed into law as an integral part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. The Armed Career Criminal Act provides for enhanced penalities for persons convicted of possessing firearms and who already have three previous convictions for robbery or burglary. Conviction under the statute results in a mandatory minimum 15-year term of imprisonment, with no possibility of probation or parole.

The armed career criminal bill for the first time brings the Federal Government into the fight against street crime by making it a Federal offense for career criminal to possess a firearm. In the 1½ years since the career criminal bill was enacted into law, it has been very effective in dealing with violent crime throughout the country. We have found, however, that there is a need to broaden the so-called predicate crimes to include drug violations and certain other serious violent acts. This amendment would change the law by broadening the prior convictions which lead to the classification of being a "career criminal."

I introduced the original career criminal bill to provide prosecutors nationwide with a new tool to be used against the most dangerous criminals—that small percentage of criminals who are responsible for as much as 70 percent of all crimes. Since its enactment, the statute has resulted in numerous convictions of this country's most hardened felons. If Congress expands the scope of this act, as I propose today, Federal prosecutors can prosecute and convict an even broader range of these career criminals.

When the bill was first introduced in 1981, a more restrictive definition of career criminal was then incorporated by this Senator in the concept of the bill because of difficulty in involving the Federal Government in the fight against street crime and the concern of States' rights on this issue. But now that the bill has been in effect for a year and a half and has been successful with the basic classification of robberies and burglaries as the definition for "career criminal," the time has come to broaden that definition so that we may have a greater sweep and more effective use of this important statute.

The matter has had hearings in the Judiciary Committee. The matter has been examined by the Attorney General's Office. The Department of Justice and the Attorney General agree that this amendment is desirable. I submit that we will vastly strengthen law enforcement in this country by having a broader definition of "career criminal."

The career criminal statute has worked precisely as planned and deserves to be expanded. Local prosecutors use the law in two ways. First, district attorneys refer these toughest criminals to the U.S. attorney for prosecution in Federal courts, which can provide more swift and certain trial and sentencing. Second, district attorneys use the mere prospect of such referral and the extremely stiff penalties to get a favorable guilty plea at a local level. I believe that this "leveraging" effect is one of the most important aspects of the statute. We have seen major cases in which local prosecutors have obtained guilty pleas and stiff sentences simply by raising the possibility of referring the case to Federal authorities for prosecution under the armed career criminal statute.

In a recent Pennsylvania case, the defendant was arrested for armed robbery of a small grocery store. The district attorney gave the defendant, who qualified as a "career criminal" under the statute, a simple choice: cooperate with the police, by acting as an informant and pleading guilty to a State firearms felony; or be referred to the U.S. attorney for Federal prosecution under the Armed Career Criminal Act, with its 15-year minimum sentence. The defendant's eager cooperation with the police resulted in the arrest of numerous drug dealers, and the defendant still will serve a 5-year prison sentence.

The U.S. Department of Justice expects prosecutions of career criminals under the statute to increase significantly as a result of special cooperative programs between Federal and local authorities, which already have been established in over 40 districts. Officials of the joint program in Detroit, for example, estimate that they will prosecute 100 career criminals in 1986. As more of these cooperative agreements are reached between local prosecutors and U.S. attorneys, the statute's effect will multiply exponentially.

Here, in Washington, DC, the first defendant convicted under the Armed Career Criminal Act was sentenced on January 27, 1986, to 35 years in prison. The felon, who had four previous armed robbery convictions, was sentenced to a 15-year mandatory minimum sentence for use of a firearm in commission of a crime. The two mandatory minimum sentences—during which there is no possibility of parole—must run consecutively. On March 11, 1986, the second career criminal conviction in Washington, DC, was announced. The defendant was convicted of illegal possession of a firearm, carrying a pistol without a license, possession of an unregistered firearm, and unlawful possession of unregistered ammunition. These offenses, when combined with the mandatory minimum 15-year sentence under the career criminal statute, carry a maximum penalty of 27 years in prison.

All of this has been achieved using the present statute, which is narrowly limited to cases where the predicate prior convictions are for robbery or burglary. Obviously, the statute can be greatly more effective if it is amended—as the Department of Justice urges—to apply to career criminals whose prior offenses may be murder, rape, or heroin smuggling.

As a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I have held hearings in many of the country's largest cities in order to encourage prosecution of career criminals. Based on the testimony presented at these Senate hearings by victims, sheriffs, U.S. attorneys, police, local prosecutors, and other criminal justice officials, and in light of the initial success of the statute, I am convinced that we must expand the law to apply to these additional classes of career criminals if we are to win the battle against violent street crime.

Mr. President, the time has come for a more vigorous attack on violent crime in the United States. Increasing the effectiveness of the Armed Career Criminal Act is a significant step toward that goal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the amendment be printed in the RECORD, together with a copy of a letter from the Assistant Attorney General, John R. Bolton, stating the administration's agreement with this amendment.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2312

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the second sentence of subsection (a) of section 1202 of title VII of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C. App. 1202(a)) is amended by striking out "for robbery or burglary, or both," and inserting in lieu thereof "for a crime of violence or a serious drug offense, or both,"

(b) Subsection (c) of section 1202 of title VII of such Act is amended by striking out paragraphs (8) and (9) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) 'serious drug offense' means an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), or section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a); and

"(9) 'crime of violence' means—

"(A) an offense that has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another; or

"(B) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.".

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, DC, March 18, 1986.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: This letter is in response to your letter of January 27, 1986, to the Deputy Attorney General requesting the views of the Department of Justice on expanding the coverage of the Armed Career Criminal Act of 1984, codified at 18 U.S.C. App. § 1202(a). In your letter you suggest two possible ways to expand the coverage of the Act.

As you note in your letter the Act is applicable to any person who is convicted of illegally possessing a firearm and who has three or more prior convictions for robbery or burglary or both. Your first suggestion would expand the Act's coverage by adding to the predicate crimes of robbery and burglary the predicate crime of "serious drug offense." "Serious drug offense" would be defined as "an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed [for violations of various sections of title 21]." Your second suggestion would expand the Act's coverage by adding to the predicate crimes of robbery and burglary the predicate crime of "crime of violence."

We think the most efficacious way to expand the Act's coverage is to remove from the Act the terms "robbery" and "burglary," and to replace them with the terms "crime of violence" and "serious drug offense." The term "crime of violence" would encompass robbery and burglary since both are felonies that "by [their] nature, [involve] a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing [them]." See 18 U.S.C. § 16(b). To include serious narcotics offenses within the Act's coverage it will be necessary to explicitly make a "serious drug offense" a predicate crime, because the term "crime of violence"—defined in 18 U.S.C. § 16—has been interpreted by several courts to exclude narcotics offenses. See e.g., United States v. Diaz, 778 F.2d 86 (2d Cir. 1985) ("narcotics offenses do not constitute crimes of violence within the meaning of [18 U.S.C.] § 924(c)"). This could be accomplished by including in your proposed amendment to the Act the definition of "serious drug offense" contained in your first suggestion.

We trust our reply is responsive to your request. If we can be of any further assistance please feel free to contact us.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BOLTON,
Assistant Attorney General.

HOBBS ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, at 11 o'clock we will be turning to consideration of the Hobbs Act and to a cloture vote seeking to bring debate to an end on the motion to proceed. This Senator objected to proceeding on the bill by unanimous consent because it was my view the amendment to the Hobbs Act poses a very fundamental change in the law of the United States which requires the attention of the Senate before we move ahead with consideration of the bill.

The majority leader then filed a cloture motion on Monday, which is scheduled for a vote today. I should like to speak briefly about the matter as I did on Monday, to call to my colleagues' attention the various provisions of the amendment to the Hobbs Act.

It is a serious matter because it will bring the Federal Government into what is, essentially speaking, an assault and battery case on a picket line, and it serves in sharp contradistinction to the amendment which I have just introduced on the career criminal bill, where it is vitally necessary for the Federal Government to play a very important role in dealing with violent crime in this country.

Contrast that, Mr. President, to an amendment to the Hobbs Act which would make it a Federal offense to have a fistfight on the picket line.

The experience I have had as district attorney of the city of Philadelphia and as an assistant district attorney in that office for some 12 years, has demonstrated to me that local law enforcement is able to handle this kind of problem. As an assistant district attorney I prosecuted the case of Commonwealth of Virginia versus Local 107 of the Teamsters, a matter which arose out of the investigation of the McClellan committee where union violence was an issue, where the case was presented in State court. Six defendants were charged with conspiracy to cheat and defraud local 107, and as part of that action union activities involved violence. All of the defendants were convicted. All six went to jail. I cite that as illustrative of the proposition that local law enforcement is fully able to deal with problems involving union violence in assault and battery cases.

Mr. President, if there is a concern that some local prosecutors will not discharge their duty, let it be known that there are other remedies available.

In Pennsylvania, for example, as is the situation in most States—and I do not want to make representations as to the law of all 50 States—the practice is that the State attorneys general have the power to supersede a district attorney where the district attorney fails or refuses to act or a local prosecutor would be unwilling to proceed where he should.

In Pennsylvania and in many other States there are supplementary remedies available for a private party to petition the presiding judge. Where a prosecuting attorney fails to act, a judge may appoint a private attorney to supersede the district attorney.

So there are ample remedies available to handle the issue of prosecution of union violence—first, by the local prosecutor; second, by the State attorney general; and third, if both those officials fail or refuse to act, by private counsel.

Mr. President, I am concerned that the effort to amend the Hobbs Act in this respect may have a chilling effect on fundamental rights. The first amendment right of freedom of speech is one of the most cherished rights we enjoy as American citizens. The right to peaceful picketing is a part of the right of freedom of speech under the first amendment. There cannot be mass picketing, there cannot be violence, there cannot be abuse of the right of picketing within the first amendment protections; but in terms of peaceful picketing and the right to convey an expression, that is guarded and protected by the first amendment. To bring the U.S. marshals or the U.S. attorneys or the Department of Justice into these cases, I submit, would have a chilling effect on the legitimate exercise of the right to peacefully picket.

Therefore, in the context of the adequacy of existing procedures, I submit that there is no need to amend the Hobbs Act to make a fistfight on a picket line a matter of Federal prosecution. In fact, it may have a very harmful, chilling effect, as I have described.

Mr. President, I yield the floor, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 11 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

WHY REAGAN WAS RIGHT IN STRIKING LIBYA

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I rise this morning to state why I believe the President was right in striking at Libya.

Shortly after ordering last Monday's air attacks against Libya, President Reagan leveled with the American people. As he noted in his TV address Monday night, the strike against Libya will not necessarily end Qadhafi's reign of terror; other actions may be necessary.

Because of this and because other actions may have to be taken, it is critical that we understand why the strike Monday night was itself required and correct. There are three reasons.

First, by his words and deeds, Qadhafi has in effect declared war against the United States. In a speech made last September, he claimed he had "the right to fight America, and * * * the right to export terrorism to them." More recently, he threatened to "pursue United States citizens in their country and streets" if the United States responded to Libya's involvement in the Rome and Vienna terrorist attacks.

As the Berlin attack demonstrated, Qadhafi meant what he said. But, then, given the legacy of terror Qadhafi has established over the last 3 years, there should have been no doubt about this. Indeed, we now have compelling evidence of Libyan involvement in planned attacks against the United States:

France expelled two members of the Libyan People's Bureau for their involvement in a planned operation against our Embassy to have been executed March 28.

A week later, France expelled two Palestinian terrorists recruited by Libya to conduct another operation against the United States in Paris.

On April 6, a Libyan plot to attack the United States Embassy in Beirut with rockets resulted in a near-miss.

In late March, Turkish police arrested two Tunisians in Istanbul hired by Libya to conduct a series of terrorists operations against United States in Turkey.

Libyan operatives are suspected of tracking United States personnel and facilities in at least 35 reported instances this year.

What Qadhafi is doing here is not to be confused with random crime. Americans have been murdered by Libya, but the intent of these killings has been to single America out rather than the particular victims of Libyan terror per se.

Indeed, what Qadhafi is attempting to achieve by his acts of terror is the sort of political submission normally gained only through victory in declared war. Through terror, he is attempting to establish a recognized right to hold any American's life at risk at any time and at any place. His hope is that by depriving Americans of the protection of their own Government, he can undermine their support of it and so force our officials to appease Libya and his will. In short, Qadhafi has declared war on America.

Second, President Reagan's action against Libya was correct and legal. The United States took military action only after repeated warnings to Qadhafi to desist in his terrorist actions. Economic sanctions were tried with our allies. But these proved to be inadequate. Finally, we tried quiet diplomacy and military demonstrations, but Qadhafi persisted in his efforts to hold American lives at risk.

Under the U.N. Charter, each nation has the inherent right to act in its own self-defense. The only qualification international law and, specifically the Geneva Convention, make is that any action taken for self-defense must be proportionate to the threat and necessary to deter further aggression—military actions must avoid unnecessary loss of civilian life.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff were careful to select only targets directly related to terrorism—military bases associated with terrorist activities or air defenses that had to be suppressed to hit these bases. Whatever collateral damage occurred was unintended and was a result of the need to make the attack at night. Economic targets and urban centers were clearly avoided.

Finally, President Reagan took care to follow both the letter and the spirit of the War Powers Act. Consultations with Members of Congress were made with all of the congressional leadership before the attack itself was executed. Indeed, if congressional support was insufficient, the President made provision to call the attack off. After sharing all of the evidence concerning Libya's terrorist actions, however, a majority of the leadership sustained the President's judgment. The raid went ahead, and formal notice was issued to Congress publicly within 48 hours.

Finally, the raid itself was appropriate. It demonstrated to Qadhafi that he can no longer count on America to be passive to his campaign of terror, that he, in fact, will have to pay a price if he persists. Our Government is not about to ignore its duty to defend and protect the Constitution and the American people. It is ready and able to defend both. Indeed, it and the American people have made it clear to Qadhafi that if he persists in holding American life at risk, he must risk his own continued rule over his own nation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

THE HOBBS ACT (S. 1774)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we are writing another chapter of the never ending saga of this body's failure to subscribe to an orderly legislative process, a process by which this Chamber, as a whole body, is supposed to consider proposed legislation which has been carefully studied, crafted, and fine tuned by a committee or committees of proper jurisdiction and expertise, and favorably reported out for this body's deliberation and consideration, a process which is to be bypassed only under extraordinary circumstances, marked by urgent need for Federal legislation, and an absence of adequate State legislation to handle a situation of crisis proportions.

There are no extraordinary circumstances addressed by this legislation. And there are, in every State, adequate statutes and enforcement mechanisms to address the problem this bill purports to address.

What we have here is a group, unhappy with the results in the Judiciary Committee, attempting to bypass the proper legislative process and to achieve on the floor what they failed to achieve in committee, this Congress or in any previous Congress. This objective and strategy is made all the worse when it is an attempt to pass poor legislation.

Mr. President, in just about 1 minute the Senate will go to a quorum call and then go to the issue about whether we are going to impose cloture on a motion to take up legislation dealing with the Hobbs Act.

I would hope, Mr. President, that the Senate would not acquiesce in the request to take that legislation up.

The legislation was considered in the Judiciary Committee. It failed to be reported out of the Judiciary Committee. Should we just now be willing to circumvent the whole legislative process by effectively ignoring the committee structure I think that we open a wide, vast process and procedure which I think runs completely contrary to the whole structure and institution of the Senate.

I will speak to the issue of the Hobbs Act should we have the opportunity to debate that issue in the future as I have in the past. But it seems to me that there is none of the required urgency to take the time of this body at this time to deliberate that legislation. We have other matters, such as the budget, other issues of foreign policy that should take our attention.

I would hope that the request of the majority leader would be rejected at this time.

THREE INTERESTING ARTICLES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues three recent articles concerning topics of interest to all Americans. The first article is an editorial that appeared in the April 6, 1986, edition of the Washington Post. It is titled "SALT II: Renounce It," and was written by Ambassador Jeanne Kirkpatrick. The editorial is a very thoughtful analysis of the reasons why the United States should discontinue adherence to SALT II. As Ambassador Kirkpatrick points out, the Soviets are violating previous strategic arms agreements with impunity, and failure to address these violations in any substantive way is a grave mistake on the part of the United States. Ambassador Kirkpatrick's editorial recommends that the United States renounce compliance with SALT II, and I commend her editorial to the attention of all my colleagues.

The second article appeared in the Officer magazine, which is a publication of the Reserve Officer's Association of the United States. The article is entitled "Latin America's Democracies Need Us," and was written by the Honorable ROBERT K. DORNAN of California. Congressman DORNAN addresses the critics of U.S. Latin American policy who claim that democratic governments are not really emerging in Latin America. His analysis of the development of democracy in Latin America is very cogent and demonstrates that the growth of democracy in Latin America, although slow, is increasing.

The third article appeared in the April 13, 1986, issue of Parade magazine and was written by Gen. William C. Westmoreland, former Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army and former commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam. The title of the article is "It Takes More Than Strength." In the article, General Westmoreland reflects on the meaning of liberty and the role of the officer and the citizen in a democracy. As he points out, liberty is not preserved by military strength alone. It is nurtured and protected by a responsible, duty conscious citizenry and the public will to bear the hardships that often accompany the protection of freedom.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to read these three important articles, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT II: RENOUNCE IT

(By Jeane Kirkpatrick)

Once upon a time—when he was a candidate rather than a president—Ronald Reagan found it easy to reach conclusions about the SALT II treaty. Candidate Reagan pronounced it "fatally flawed" and "unequal," incapable of restraining the growth of Soviet strategic capabilities.

But, like most Americans, Ronald Reagan longs to slow the arms race with the Soviet Union—if he cannot end it entirely. Therefore, desiring to maintain a good climate and believing that some limits are better than hone, President Reagan decided that the U.S. government should honor the SALT II treaty on an interim basis while he tried to negotiate something better.

Five years later there is nothing better on the horizon, the evidence of treaty violations by the Soviets has accumulated, and the cost of "interim restraint" is rising sharply.

Now the president faces a treaty deadline and must make a crucial decision. To continue in compliance with SALT II limits, the United States must dismantle two Poseidon submarines when the new Trident submarine begins sea trials on May 20.

The president must decide what to do about the Poseidons, and more broadly, what to do about the SALT II agreement. Since the agreement, negotiated by the Carter administration, was never ratified by the Senate, compliance is a matter of executive policy—not of law.

It is up to Ronald Reagan. He and his principal advisers are currently deliberating the pros and cons of continuing compliance, abandoning the treaty, or possibly setting a course that would systematically link United States and Soviet compliance, thus taking account of Soviet violations.

Those who advocate continued compliance emphasize the military disadvantages to the United States of abandoning the agreement. The chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Les Aspin, has emphasized that ending the present restraints on production of new weapons systems would give the Soviets an advantage because they have greater capacity than the United States to produce strategic weapons systems and missiles with larger payloads.

Opponents of continued compliance counter that the United States pays too high a price for these limited and uncertain constraints. Abiding by SALT II, they say, will inhibit modernization of U.S. military forces (including Midgetman testing and deployment), prevent the United States from retaining needed weapons systems, raise American defense costs in this year of Gramm-Rudman and diminish our already reduced margin of security.

Both sides acknowledge that the political consequences of a decision on SALT II are at least as important as its military effects. Supporters worry that U.S. failure to comply would damage prospects for future arms control negotiations and offend our allies—who are enthusiastic about all United States/Soviet arms agreements that will not affect British and French arms or decouple American and European defense.

Even the supporters of SALT II agree that some account must be taken of Soviet violations. Certainly, the president is not free to ignore them. His report to Congress on Soviet noncompliance with arms control agreements (December 1985) described deployment of the SS-25 missile as a "clear and irreversible violation" and noted that the Soviet policy of deliberate concealment was contrary to both the letter and the spirit of SALT II.

The latest Department of Defense report, "Soviet Military Power," cites several additional SALT violations and makes it clear they are part of a broader pattern of selective Soviet noncompliance with existing arms control agreements.

So far the United States has charged the Soviets with important violations of SALT I and II, the ABM Treaty, the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention and the Geneva Protocol.

Because the Reagan administration has chosen to make Soviet violations a matter of public record, the decision on SALT II must be made in the light of that record.

Will Ronald Reagan commit the United States to compliance with an agreement the Soviets violate? Or will he decide that Soviet noncompliance has effectively—if informally—already vitiated the agreement?

Reaffirming the SALT II treaty in the face of violations would send a clear signal that the United States is ready to settle for less than we say we will. Such a message is hardly conducive to negotiating new meaningful, verifiable arms control agreements.

What would be the domestic political fallout of renouncing U.S. compliance with a flawed treaty that the Soviets are violating? Polls conducted in the last six months indicate that a majority of Americans want our government to negotiate arms control agreements, but do not believe we should honor agreements that are being violated by the Soviet Union.

The president's realism and common sense should lead him to the same conclusion.

Latin America's Democracies Need Us

(By Robert K. Dornan)

The year 1986 began on an optimistic note for U.S. foreign policy in Latin America and the Caribbean. A democratic revolution has been sweeping through the region, displacing "traditional" military dictatorships and oligarchies.

Over the last five years elected civilian presidents have replaced military rulers in nine countries: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru and Uruguay. In contrast, only six years ago two-thirds of our Latin neighbors lived under military-dominated governments.

Numerous factors have contributed to the region-wide upsurge in democratic politics. Throughout the electoral process, international observers have consistently reported that voters were responding to a desire to repudiate both leftist revolutionary alternatives as well as military obligarchies.

For most Latin Americans the uncertainties of representative democracy are far more preferable than the violence and abuse of the far left or the far right.

As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I have observed that voter participation originates from internal dynamics and is not solely a response to U.S. prompting. In many countries the atmosphere underlying the electoral process has been hopeful about the democratic potential to facilitate long-term development. It is generally recognized throughout Latin America that democracy builds confidence in the private sector, and creates a stable environment essential to the attraction of international capital. It is also acknowledged that the general populace throughout Latin America recognizes that governmental accountability to the electorate is the best guarantor of basic human rights and internal stability.

To my disappointment though, many have expressed the view that democracy in Latin America, and particularly in Central America, is not a reality. This simplistic and short-sighted perspective does not give proper credit to our neighbors in their struggle to implement truly representative democratic institutions. Pessimistic regional observers contend that the armed forces are only allowing power-sharing with civilian politicians in order to facilitate a flow of funds from the United States.

To these analysts, elections in El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala only constitute a cosmetic facade of democracy which merits little long-term attention or respect. That is a cynical and unfair analysis.

It is true that long historical traditions of military interventionism and "caudillo" politics makes it naive to assume that a comprehensive change will occur overnight. Nor can we expect the electoral process to be perfect.

The growth of democracy is inherently evolutionary in nature and must be adapted to the peculiar circumstances of individual nations. With many exceptions and nuances of development, Latin American politics follows a general step-wise progression.

Wars and revolutions of independence.

"Caudillo" or Personalist Authoritarianism.

Limited democratic participation.

Democracy with enlarged participation.

Total participation democracy.

The northern tier states of South America, such as Venezuela and Ecuador are concrete examples of just such an evolution. Venezuela has made a successful transition to democracy in which constitutional institutions have survived for nearly 30 years. In Ecuador, it was in fact the military that set the stage for a successful transition to democracy.

Even the forefathers of authoritarian Latin American politics, the Spaniards, have just recently celebrated the 10th anniversary of uninterrupted democratic rule—a nation where just a decade ago a viable democracy was considered only a dream.

The separation of the military from politics will occur as political parties consolidate and legitimate forms of expression become institutionalized. At present, many of these countries do not have any convenient democratic tradition upon which to model themselves. Decades of military rule have left the political process fragmented.

As Latin democracies establish themselves as problem-solving mechanisms and instruments of equitable development they will ensure their own survival. The role of the United States in this process should be to provide development assistance which can buy the necessary time to allow a fledgling democracy to consolidate and to help ease the pains of strict austerity measures.

Nicaragua stands in stark contrast to the democratic trends in the region. The Leninist Sandinista Directorate has been able to consolidate the reigns of political power and is committed to undermining neighboring democracies through subversion.

Most recently the Colombian government has presented evidence that the November M-19 commando raid of the Palace of Justice in Bogota was substantially aided by the Sandinistas. At least half of the weapons seized after the terrorist attack can be traced unequivocally to the Managua regime.

Less well recognized, however, is the threat Nicaragua poses to democracies by encouraging the intervention of the military into the political process in the name of state security.

Although internal dynamics have been the primary factor driving Latin American support for democracy, the United States has rightfully acted as the catalyst for democratic evolution. We North Americans must consider the implications that derive from self-defeating attitudes of doubt and despair so characteristic of our foreign policy in the early post Vietnam years.

The United States is the leader of the western hemisphere and as such has a responsibility to encourage democratic solidarity with our Latin neighbors. We cannot expect the leaders of Latin American nations to give full support to democracy and resist the short-sighted attractions of violent revolution when our own commitment to political liberty is faltering and inconsistent.

Hopefully, the key architects of U.S. foreign policy will see the critical connection between the leadership role this country has taken and the support for fragile democracies throughout Latin America.

I am encouraged by a much more confident U.S. policy in the region which is taking the initiative with increasing confidence to assist our neighbors to fulfill their own aspirations. Behind much of the rhetoric voiced by Latin American leaders today, one finds solid encouragement for decisive U.S. actions.

The challenges to democracy in Latin America are great but we should be encouraged by the democratic transitions that have already taken place.

The United States must take the offensive politically and economically rather than become mired in handwringing, pessimistic despair. The fact of the matter is that an assertive U.S. foreign policy will never be popular anywhere. The United States is simply too large a presence, too successful economically and too diverse a culture to ever be cuddly or loveable as a nation. Respect though, will always exist for the United States of America when we follow through on principle and support.

I believe that the world will follow a strong leadership role of our great country. It is beyond any doubt that the world will never support defeatist American policies.

It Takes More Than Strength

(By Gen. William C. Westmoreland)

Almost 24 years ago, at the United States Military Academy, I was host for Gen. Douglas MacArthur when he made his historic farewell address to the corps of cadets at West Point, NY. He distilled how he felt about his life in the Army, its principles and its unique relationship to our civilian government.

I was impressed—as was the country—by the old soldier's idealism, pride in service to our country and dedication to the Army he fought with in three wars. He counseled the cadets, "A soldier above all prays for peace, for he must suffer and bear the deepest wounds and scars of war." At the time, the American people also were inspired by the idealistic words of a new, young President,

John F. Kennedy, who had dedicated a nation to "pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

Almost a half century has passed since I graduated from the U.S. Military Academy, and this has remained my view of the soldier's role in a democracy: to guarantee, as a professional, the survival and success of liberty. To me, the symbol of Lady Liberty is far more profound than that of the cartoon-like Uncle Sam—a figure dressed in red, white and blue and a funny hat, demanding: "I want you." He is asking you to join the Army but does not tell you why. The Statue of Liberty, on the other hand, tells you why. She represents individual and national freedom, the ideals upon which our nation was founded. She conveys warmth and a love of country.

These ideals have always inspired those serving in the military. Today, as an old soldier myself, I look over a career of proud memories. The years have been eventful ones for me—and for the United States. When I was commissioned, our country was inward-looking and militarily weak by current standards. World War II came to our shores before we were ready. Unified as never before by the flames of Pearl Harbor, we gained new responsibilities and status as a world power. During those years, the U.S. inherited the mantle of leadership of the free world.

In that role, we became the international champions of liberty, which put us on a collision course with Communist designs—first in Korea and then in Vietnam. Our initiatives were applauded by our people. I think most believed we were on the right course, both in the interest of liberty and in our own self-interest. At the same time, public attitudes toward the military began to shift drastically. In many cases, the Army was portrayed as a negative force. Many forgot the vital connection between the survival of our nation's fundamental ideals and those privileged to serve her.

Under our cherished Constitution, civilian leadership must be supreme in decisions involving the national interest—though our military leadership does have an obligation to make known any threat to our welfare and to appraise our preparedness to defend ourselves. In the end, however, it is the soldier who must fight our battles. For the morale of that soldier, it is important that his role be understood and appreciated in our society.

I believe that our leadership in strength is the best guarantee of peace and justice in the world—and of our own liberty at home. But leadership of true quality, that which is noble and inspiring, involves more than strength. To be legitimate, it must be grounded not on personal ambition but on our great democratic principles: due process and equal justice under the law, equality of opportunity, loyalty to our nation and to those carrying responsibility, and fairness in human and governmental relations, all a part of the end product—liberty. Throughout our history, only a very few military officers have violated those standards.

It is in the context of these broad challenges to our democratic society that the officers of our armed forces must be prepared to serve the nation. It requires a special type of leadership and a special type of organization. It is a trust, founded on idealism and love of country. President Reagan has said, "Who else but an idealist would choose to become a member of the armed forces?"

Indeed, nothing is more important to the future of our nation than the inculcation of our soldiers, our youth, our future citizens, with the virtues that have made America great. The Army, with its institutional idealism, has always strived to do just that. Not only does it prepare soldiers to deter aggression but it is also a great teacher of patriotism. The soldier understands only one system of rank. It is not the rank of bars and leaves. It is the rank of dedication, of duty, of care and concern for his mission and his men, of integrity of character, willingness to learn, readiness to admit error and devotion to principle. Soldiers may not be articulate on these principles, but they fully expect their officers to live and act by them.

However, in our open, free-for-all society, the swings in public attitude—particularly regarding the military—can be dismaying. It is often difficult for our young citizens to separate the facts from the propaganda. During the hectic years of the war in Vietnam, with the increase in drug abuse and campus protests, many seemed to lose confidence in our traditional institutions. And currently, fears of a nuclear holocaust or another Vietnam, threaten to weaken our defenses and, paradoxically, to increase the very danger we fear.

We all share a concern for our nation's future. And, indeed, it is frightening to contemplate that we might, in our confusion, cast aside the ideals, ethics and standards that have made our country great.

America is great because it is a land of liberty, endless challenge and unbounded opportunity. We have overcome foreign and domestic strife and staggering social, economic and political problems, and by doing so have become the most powerful nation on earth. We added to the challenges that confronted us one of our own choosing: to be, by our example, a beacon to other people in the world for individual liberty. No other nation has done that.

Never before in history has a nation so freely shared the treasure of its hard work; never before has a nation provided others with so much security: never before has a nation so responsibly shouldered the burden of world leadership or combined the material and human aspirations of man to such a reality.

Yes, we have faltered. We've made mistakes. We have not been perfect. But when one weighs the good and bad, there can only be one conclusion: The vision of our founding fathers has become a reality.

We should think about that. We should think about it when cynical, petty people mock our ideals and sneer at our sacrifices; when they seek to diminish the bedrock values of our society by calling them clichés.

Unlike the many college students in the late 1960s and early 1970s who wished to change our system, today's campus generation apparently has chosen to work within it, respecting the limitations that are a necessary part of freedom. Dostoyevski, the great Russian writer of a century ago, wrote: "No man or nation can exist without a sublime ideal." Such an ideal is necessary to weld together individuals and social efforts. We are fortunate in America that such a unifying ideal has always been in view. In practice, that ideal has embodied respect for God and country and involves dedication to the principles of the American Constitution, made explicit in our laws and public documents. That dedication travels under another name: patriotism.

I remember, in the mid-1970s, after I had retired from the Army, I visited one of the Army basic training centers and talked to the command sergeant major, the senior noncommissioned officer of the base, a fellow paratrooper with whom I had served in Vietnam. He expressed to me concern about the attitude of many of the young men in training. He told me that his final charge to those new recruits after several weeks of intensive training was: "Men, in the past several years, we in our country sadly have destroyed the tall towers. Now, I want you men to work with me to rebuild the first one." The first of those tall towers was patriotism. The name of the sergeant major was Antonio Torres, a man born outside the continental United States in a family that spoke no English.

Patriotism demands commitment to the principle that for every right there is a duty. Without the practice of that precept by our citizens and institutions, our democracy simply cannot survive.

As a proud old soldier, I was pleased and honored when I was asked to be a member of the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Centennial Commission, but I wondered why. Perhaps it was because I have fought in three wars for the principle of liberty. And perhaps it was because I commanded in Vietnam for more than four years the cream of our American youth and saw them give their all in support of that idealism personified by Lady Liberty.

Yes, it seems our nation has rebuilt the first tall tower, to be symbolized by the rededication of our beloved Statue of Liberty.

THE NATIONAL STRATEGY ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to enthusiastically support S. 2064. Introduced by my esteemed colleague, Senator WARNER of Virginia, this bill would require the President to make an annual report on the national strategy of the United States to certain committees of Congress and require joint committee meetings to be held on such report.

The National Strategy Act not only supports a more logical budget planning process but also encourages a more thoughtful and considered decisionmaking process. Although it may not bring consensus, it will certainly go a long way in preventing reactive decisions that address short-term problems but fail to evaluate the long-term impact of our decisions.

I would also like to take this opportunity to commend my senior colleague and friend from Arizona, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER. He has worked diligently with Senator NUNN to reform the defense establishment to ensure better military readiness and cost effective weapons procurement policies. Senator GOLDWATER, commenting on this issue, said: "We need a grand strategy and we need it now. . . . It must be sufficient to deter our enemies and protect our friends. And it must be understood by the American people and have their support." I am confident that this National Strategy Act will have the support of Arizonans as well as make important steps toward accomplishing the broader goals articulated by Senator GOLDWATER.

Since becoming a member of the Senate, I have noted the difficulty that Congress has in maintaining a clear view of our Nation's strategic objectives and the support required to reach those objectives. Seldom do we get the complete picture, the strategic overview that defines where the administration wants to go, how it's going to get there, and what the expected results of these policies should be. Certainly, the Packard Commission would endorse the wisdom of this legislation. The Commission, appointed by the President, noted "there is no rational system whereby the executive branch and the Congress reach coherent and enduring agreement on national military strategy, the forces to carry it out, and the funding that should be provided in light of the overall economy and competing claims on national resources. The absence of such a system contributes substantially to the instability and uncertainty that plague our defense program. These cause imbalances in our military forces and capabilities, and increase the costs of procuring military equipment." The Commission goes on to articulate a comprehensive statement on national security objectives and priorities.

Over the years, I have observed information coming to us on a wide range of strategic issues in bits and pieces, in different versions, and from a variety of sources. We sort through the information, read posture statements, listen to addresses from the administration, conduct hearings, ask questions and evaluate responses. After all of this is done, I'm still not convinced we have the big picture and, more importantly, I don't think the people of this country have the kind of overview they need to know where our Nation's strategy is taking us. This becomes particularly critical in these times when so much national attention is paid to how Congress allocates funds in an era of increased budgetary austerity.

The time has passed when we can afford to provide funding without examining the overall value of individual programs and how they support the attainment of larger national objectives. Developing a comprehensive, unified national strategy is a strong step in the right direction. Both Chambers of Congress will be better prepared and equipped to study, evaluate, and decide on the best way to carry out national strategy with this bill. This is an outstanding example of farsighted law-making and I am pleased to cosponsor this legislation.

JOSEPH FACCI

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise to commemorate the life of Joseph Facci, a life devoted to a selfless crusade against human misery.

I met Joseph Facci during my years as chief of the Foreign Language Division of the Office of War Information in World War II. A Dante-like character in appearance, and a refugee from the Mussolini regime, he was in charge of working with the Italian-American community in my division.

Facci played a creative and decisive part in getting Italian aliens exempted from the enemy alien classification in 1944, in pushing for a separate peace with the Italian people, and in helping to bring our two great countries together.

When America entered the war, aliens from Italy and Germany were officially labeled "enemies." They could not travel freely and could not take certain jobs. Loyal native-born and naturalized Americans of these ancestries, as well as the aliens, resented these restrictions. As the Rome-Berlin axis began to falter and Italians became unhappy with their alliance with the Nazis, Facci came up with an idea designed to impose greater strains on the alliance and to solve the problems of these Italian-Americans. He proposed that President Roosevelt issue a proclamation ending the enemy alien certification for Italians living in America. He convinced me, and I took on the task of selling the idea. I sold it inside OWI all the way to its top—to Elmer Davis. Then Davis and I sold it all the way to the top in the Department of Justice to Attorney General Francis Biddle. Then Biddle and Davis sold it to Secretary of State Cordell Hull and to President Roosevelt. All the while Facci was pressing me, and I was pushing Davis.

In his Columbus Day speech in 1943, Roosevelt announced that Italians were no longer enemy aliens. I will never forget Joe's joy and pride the day FDR made this announcement. Restrictions on Italians in the United States were lifted. And leaflets were dropped from planes flying over Italy just before we invaded that country, announcing that Americans now considered them friends.

Bruno Foa, director of the Bureau of Latin American Research, wrote to me: "It was certainly an enormous step forward in the grand strategy of political warfare."

Count Carlo Sforza, Italy's first postwar Foreign Minister, declared then that this act, establishing that we were "friends not enemies," saved the lives of countless American soldiers—and Italians, too—when the Allies landed in Italy to drive out the Nazis.

Incidentally, Randolpho Pacciardi, the leader of the refugee anti-Fascist Italians in America during the war, and Italy's postwar Minister of Defense, arranged for me to be awarded the Star of Solidarity by the Italian Government in 1946. The award should have gone to Joe Facci.

No one could have done all this better than a man who had been an Italian soldier in World War I and a prisoner of war, and who was then one of the first to take up the struggle against the Fascists. Joe Facci loved his Italy, and its people, just as he came to love America, and its people. And he joined in the effort to restore the freedom of Italians and to preserve the freedom of Americans in World War II.

Facci died in Maryland in May 1979, at the age of 85. It seems to me that the passage of time has added a perspective to the remarkable events of his life.

His story is unique in that he was able to spend more than 50 years fighting against human misery in causes of national and international importance, that cut across the whole fabric of society.

Despite his great eloquence and pragmatism, he never reached a vast audience with his own words and personality, yet his successful life reminds us of the supremacy of moral courage and of our obligation to fight as he did, whenever he could, against injustice, intolerance, and cruelty.

Joe was born in northern Italy in August 1893, the eldest son in a large family of well-to-do millers. He gave up training for the priesthood because he decided that his life would be more effective if he devoted it to direct efforts to ameliorate the misery of the people. For the same reasons he refused to go into the prosperous family milling business. He married Catherine (Nella) Marta, from his native village, and served in Italy's Alpine troops in the bitter fighting on the Austrian front in World War I. He became a prisoner of war and failed twice in attempts to escape. After his second effort he was placed in solitary confinement in the dungeons of the prison-fortress of Komaron.

He gained his law degree at the University of Padua in 1919. He then served the Italian Government in Austria and Italy, in increasingly responsible posts, where he acquired experience in economics and foreign affairs, especially foreign trade. He rose to director of a vital trade unit.

Meanwhile he had begun to fight the oppressive Fascist system, which he thought represented a gross travesty of the spirit of the Italian people, and was a blueprint for eventual national disaster. Without joining any party or group, he spoke against it openly. He saw his friends persecuted and jailed, and he decided he must save his family by leaving Italy. He also felt that his crusade would be stronger fought from abroad.

In America he found what he most fervently needed, a free, dynamic society. His appreciation and love for this country lasted the rest of his life.

He became Secretary of the Italian Chamber of Commerce in San Francisco, an association of northern California merchants concerned with Italian trade. There he fought for free trade and against the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, and he was widely quoted in the press. When his growing anti-Fascist activities became irreconcilable with his position, he left and worked as a freelance writer and lecturer. He established and published the Italian language monthly Cultura Populare, a vehicle for his fight against fascism, and for help to working men and women and the small farmers of northern California during the Depression. He stirred opposition to Mussolini and his regime among Bay Area Italians.

Facci became a U.S. citizen in May 1935. In 1940 he moved to Washington, hoping to find a place where his ideas and talents might be more influential. After a stint with the Department of Agriculture, he came to work for me at OWI, where he made his extraordinary contribution to the war effort.

After the war he passed up opportunities to return to Italy in the new government, and went to work for Unesco in CREFAL, the joint Unesco-Mexican Government-Latin American center in Patzcuaro Michoacan, Mexico. CREFAL's mission was to teach selected schoolteachers from Latin American countries the special skills needed for adult education, community development, and self-help. There he promoted the agricultural cooperative, not state ownership, as the vehicle for land reform in the near-feudal systems. He retired at 65 and devoted himself to helping the region's peasant-farmers, the campesinos. He obtained money from bankers, contributions of farm tractors from Ford and International Harvester, service from the phone company, and road improvement from the state of Michoacan. He and his Nella then obtained assistance from local contractors and wealthy families to build a vitally needed primary school in Patzcuaro. He continued to write and devote himself to local projects for the campesinos and their families until 1970, when he returned to Alexandria, VA, to spend the rest of his life there.

In sum, Joe Facci was highly intelligent and remarkably brave, unafraid to move into new fields, a voracious reader, talented in language, and a prolific writer and orator in Italian, English, and Spanish. In the best sense of the word he was a polemicist, and in the best tradition, a reformer.

He was gregarious. He loved good food and wine in moderation, good stories, and the out-of-doors. Politically progressive, he was personally conservative, unconcerned about clothes or luxuries. Since the family was, to him, the basic unit of society, he believed its healthy survival was worth the sacrifice of individual desires. Although his frenetic work habits caused him to neglect some family matters, he found the time to know his children well and to contribute to their development.

Throughout their more than 60 years of marriage, his wife Nella, who is still living, shared his ideals and helped him. With great personal sacrifice, she managed the affairs of the family, contributing to a good life and education for their devoted children, Hugo Facci and Mary Marton.

Facci believed that the greatness of the American Constitution was that it stated only the barest principles to guide its people and their political associations. It demanded that its people constantly reapply those principles in new laws and contracts in order to avoid abuses growing out of social and environmental changes. He felt that impartial, balanced dissemination of information was second only to basic education for the survival of a democratic society.

Change was not to be feared in a free society because, if imperfect, it could always be corrected. Abuses, imperfections, and injustices were everywhere, and the greatest danger was to tolerate and entrench them. Thus he admired FDR, knowing that the New Deal's flaws could be corrected later, but that human misery of the Depression was a permanent drain on people's lives. And so it was with human misery everywhere. It had to be fought at all costs in the interest of the individuals and their societies. There was no overall, simplistic, unalterable doctrine. There was only free information and knowledge, free and open dialog, and the free democratic process.

His philosophy could best be expressed as a belief in the inviolability of the individual, and of the human spirit, and the need to care for and respect one another.

Joseph Facci's life symbolizes in a very substantive way the fact that our country's richness comes not only from its natural wealth but from the spirit of its citizens, native and naturalized, representing every corner of our Earth.

MOUNT HOLYOKE INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Education, Arts, and Humanities Subcommittee, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues an event which begins tomorrow, Thursday, April 17, and ends this Saturday, April 19, which will celebrate 35 years of the Washington Internship Program of Mount Holyoke College.

As many Members already know, Mount Holyoke, located in South Hadley, MA, is the oldest women's college in the United States, and will be celebrating its 150th anniversary next year. In 1950, Victoria Schuck, then a professor of political science at Mount Holyoke, created the Washington Internship Program, which has allowed more than a thousand young women to gain their first working experience in Washington, and awakened their interest in politics. In fact, the internship program was so successful at Mount Holyoke that it has been used as a model by many other institutions of higher learning for their own students.

Following my remarks, I ask unanimous consent that two statements on the internship program and its founder be included in the RECORD. However, I would first like to point out what the real success of Vicky Schuck's program has been that it illustrates the importance of the influence of teachers in all our lives. Dr. Schuck has dedicated her life to seeing that young women have the same opportunities and receive the same quality education available to young men in this country. She has devoted countless hours of personal counseling, arranged thousands of unique adventures for her students and been totally supportive of and accessible to her many students at Mount Holyoke over the years. The number of now accomplished, successful women who return for this conference is a testament to their respect, admiration, gratitude, and love for their former teacher and mentor. To have touched so many people's lives by encouraging their ambitions is surely a great accomplishment, and I want to acknowledge Vicky Schuck's work as teacher today. I wish those who attend the conference over the next 3 days good luck and am sure they will learn much in their meetings and exchanges.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOUNT HOLYOKE COLLEGE WASHINGTON INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

Mount Holyoke College's Washington Internship Program has since its beginnings brought hundreds of Mount Holyoke women to the halls of Congress, the White House, federal agencies and lobbying organizations in the nation's capital, giving students the opportunity to witness politics in action and to participate in policy-making decisions.

When Victoria Schuck, professor of political science at Mount Holyoke, inaugurated the internship program by placing early interns in the offices of Washington politicians whom she knew personally, students were given an opportunity to add hands-on experience to their classroom studies. In the years since those first interns arrived in Washington, campuses nationwide have adopted internship programs as an invaluable learning resource.

The early placements paved the way for an expanded program at Mount Holyoke, as students found themselves spending summers in executive and legislative offices of federal, state and local governments; in newspaper offices and television newsrooms; in national party headquarters and in foundations for the arts, humanities and education. A widening network of contacts in Washington gave the program a solid footing in its early years, and officials who agreed to sponsor the first interns became its strongest advocates, requesting additional interns in succeeding years. Thus, an institution was born.

The list of names of internship sponsors forms a roster of the political and the powerful in post-war Washington. Mike Mansfield, Edward P. Kennedy, Thomas P. O'Neill, Silvio Conte, Bella Abzug, Gerald Ford, Edmund Muskie, Shirley Chisholm, John F. Kennedy, Edward W. Brooke, Lyndon Johnson, Andrew Young, Martha Griffiths, Birch Bayh, Richard Nixon, Clifford Case, Jimmy Carter and Charles Percy are among the politicians whose offices benefited from the work of interns and who offered those interns a close-up view of the political process. Interns wrote speeches, researched legislation and compiled reports; they published articles and participated in decision-making. The inner workings of Washington offices, from the ground up, were made available to them, and the interns seized their opportunity for an invaluable enhancement of the classroom experience.

Victoria Schuck's goal in creating the Washington Internship Program was to make internships "a significant part of the liberal arts education" and to allow Mount Holyoke women to pursue their own interests within the political framework. They learned to ask questions: "How are decisions made?" "How does party leadership function?" "What is the relationship between local and national organizations?" "What tools are used to measure public opinion?" And they learned how to find answers: as participant observers in political campaigns, as survey researchers, as speechwriters and as planning assistants, the interns discovered that they could apply political reality to their classroom learning.

The program offers personal as well as political discovery to its participants, and for many interns career decisions have been an important outgrowth of their summer experiences. Many Mount Holyoke students returned to Washington and to their state capitals, to continue the work they had begun or to enter politics themselves. The Washington Internship Program brought politics to Mount Holyoke and assured that Mount Holyoke became a part of the national political scene.

VICTORIA SCHUCK

Victoria Schuck, who created Mount Holyoke's Washington Internship Program, is a political scientist whose career exemplifies her credo of combining scholarly excellence with political experience.

She was graduated with great distinction from Stanford University, where she received her M.A. and Ph.D., and she taught there before joining the Mount Holyoke College faculty in 1940. By the time she left Mount Holyoke in 1974, Victoria Schuck had written scores of articles and monographs, served on the boards of federal, state and local commissions and created the landmark Washington Internship Program, which has sent legions of Mount Holyoke women to the nation's capital for a first-hand look at the political processes and policy-making they had studied in the classroom.

Leaving Mount Holyoke hardly brought a change of pace for Victoria Schuck as she moved on to assume the presidency of Mount Vernon College in Washington, D.C., subsequently becoming a guest scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center and, currently, the visiting scholar in the political science department at Stanford University.

It has long been a maxim that Victoria Schuck "knew everybody" in Washington. Certainly, the names of the senators, members of congress and other officials who took part in the internship program at its beginning and who joined later form a "Who's Who" list of Washington leaders during the past 40 years.

Victoria Schuck continues to be a forceful presence in politics and political science. She was coeditor of the 1979 anthology Women Organizing and the 1981 volume New England Politics, also serving as contributor on the latter. She has contributed to the Notable American Women series with a biography of Republican member of the House Edith Nourse Rogers and is currently examining issues in mobile government and reorganization of the White House. While at Mount Vernon she was a member of the District of Columbia Commission on Post-secondary Education and was an educator consultant on a panel of the United States General Accounting Office. She continues to serve on the editorial board of the Social Science Quarterly and to contribute to the National Municipal Review, the Wilson Quarterly and Phi Beta Kappa's The Key Reporter.

In 1985, Victoria Schuck represented the American Political Science Association at the Forum of the United Nations World Conference on the Decade of Women, held at Nairobi, Kenya, where she organized a panel on women in local government. She went from there to Paris to serve on panels at the meeting of the World Congress of Political Scientists held there in July.

Victoria Schuck's interest and participation in government and community affairs dates to her early days at Mount Holyoke. She was a member of the United Nations Conference at San Francisco and was appointed by President Kennedy to the President's Commission on Registration and Voting Participation. Regionally, Victoria Schuck served as a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of Massachusetts, the Massachusetts Building Authority and the Massachusetts Advisory Committee on the U.S. Commission of Civil Rights. She was also chair of the Town of South Hadley Planning Board.

Her professional affiliations during her years at Mount Holyoke include president of the New England Political Science Association, secretary and vice-president of the Northeastern Political Science Association. She was also president of the state division of the American Association of University Women.

She is a member of Phi Beta Kappa and researched the White House staff as a scholar of the Brookings Institution; she was also a grantee of the Asia Society, doing research in Vietnam in the late 1960's.

Victoria Schuck's influence continues today through the Washington Internship Program, which helped open the doors of politics to women. Her work and efforts are felt in the national and state capitals, by the women who arrived there for one summer and returned to pursue their careers. Victoria Schuck helped to bring women and politics together.

MAY THE GOOD LORD BLESS YOU, STEPHEN B. ROMAN

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, there are times when we wish to recognize someone whom we admire and appreciate. This is the case regarding Stephen B. Roman, a Canadian citizen who on April 17 attains the ripe young age of 65.

Stephen's biography is replete with one basic theme: He has done it mostly all by himself. Emigrating from Czechoslovakia, a country I know so well, because I served there as a Foreign Service Officer in the late 1940's, Stephen changed his destiny from being an ordinary farmer to becoming one of Canada's most enterprising and successful business leaders as Chairman and CEO of Denison Mines, a multi-billion dollar multi-venture corporation with worldwide investments, including in the United States.

How did he do it—to accomplish so much in such a relatively short time? Stephen says "By faith and good farmer's common sense," which he still practices. "If you treat people as though they were the most important people in the world * * * they, too, will respond positively," is Stephen B. Roman's motto.

And, he has proved his motto over and over. Most recently during the Canadian Papal visit, he prevailed in getting Pope John Paul II to come and bless the cornerstone of a Slovak Byzantine Rite Catholic cathedral, while Canadian hierarchs sought to prevent such a side trip. It was no easy task to overcome such an obstacle.

He has a great passion for his Slovak ethnic roots. He was primarily responsible for unifying all the various small emigre groups into one cohesive Slovak World Congress headquartered in Toronto. The Communist government in Czechoslovakia has been ceaselessly trying with all kinds of underhanded maneuvers to embarrass Stephen Roman and those who work for the Congress. Despite that, in the United States alone, some half million members of fraternal, civic and social associations belong to and support the Slovak World Congress, which he founded 15 years ago.

Since we have not forgotten our brethren who are still suffering religious persecution and denied their basic human and civil rights, we get together periodically to bring to world public opinion a record of those abuses. And it is a sorry record for the once most progressive country of Czechoslovakia, to deny their own peoples—the Slovaks and Czechs—the basic freedoms which are so elemental and essential to us living in our adopted homes.

The SWC meets and holds a conference every 6 months somewhere in the free world to press would public opinion on these issues.

"It is Czechoslovakia that has lost the genius outflow, when our people had to flee for their lives because of the inhuman persecution; Czechoslovakia is the loser. If I had the wisdom to develop economic power in Canada—in a free environment—perhaps I could have done a similar thing in my own native Slovakia," says Stephen B. Roman. He was actively involved in negotiations with the Dubcek government and investing in Slovakia, but then Soviet tanks moved in.

As the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I had the privilege to encourage hearings on "Religious Persecution in Communist Bloc Countries of Eastern Europe" recently, and I was disturbed by the testimony of the persecution still practiced by the Prague government in Czechoslovakia.

Stephen B. Roman is also an active promoter of good Canadian-American relations, which are so essential in this hemisphere. I look forward to seeing his name associated with other outstanding Canadians representing his country in heart-to-heart negotiations on vital issues of concern to both our countries.

My Dear Friend, Stephen B. Roman, Happy Birthday.

TEST BAN RESOLUTION

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, on December 18, 1985 the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH] and I introduced a joint resolution (S.J. Res. 252) requesting the President of the United States to negotiate controls upon and the early prohibition of nuclear explosions.

I ask that the Senators from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN], Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], and [Mr. PACKWOOD] be added as cosponsors, for a current total of 21.

We hope other Senators will join us in cosponsoring this legislation, which we intend to pursue vigorously this year. In this connection, I should note that we expect to hold hearings on test ban issues in the Foreign Relations Committee early next month.

THE FUTURE OF HUMAN SERVICE PROGRAMS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the administration's budget proposals for the 1987 fiscal year, combined with enactment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Deficit Reduction Act, have caused deep concern in many communities over the future of human service programs that help meet the needs of the poor, the elderly, young people and others who urgently need assistance.

Recently in the city of Warwick, RI, the agencies and organizations that provide this assistance joined together as the Human Service Providers of Warwick to compile a comprehensive assessment of the impact that proposed budget cuts and the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act would have on their programs and services.

Their assessment concluded that because of the breadth and severity of potential budget cuts, the funding reductions would "weaken the foundation of core services, thereby threatening the quality of life for the entire community".

Among the programs and activities in Warwick that would be seriously affected by administration or Gramm-Rudman-Hollings funding reductions are programs that provide food and shelter, substance abuse prevention and education, delinquency prevention, senior citizen transportation and meal programs, alcoholism and mental health treatment, health care for the elderly, day care assistance, emergency housing, weatherization, fuel assistance and youth employment.

I believe the human service agencies and organizations in the city of Warwick have provided a fine public service by compiling this assessment of the potential impact of Federal budget cuts. I have no doubt that many other communities in Rhode Island, and indeed across the Nation, would be confronted with similar problems if these proposed funding reductions take place.

It is exactly because of this kind of indiscriminate, unthinking reductions in Federal funding that I voted against enactment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation. And it is because of the demonstrated importance and effectiveness of many of these community human services programs that I oppose the deep budget cuts proposed by the administration in programs that have already been subjected to funding reductions.

Because the proposed budget reductions would have an impact on other communities much like the impact on Warwick, RI, I believe this assessment would be of interest to Members of the Senate, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WARWICK HUMAN SERVICE PROVIDERS

We, the Human Service Providers of Warwick, have joined together out of common concern for the potential effects of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Legislation and President Reagan's proposed FY '87 budget. To substantiate the reasons for our concern, we have prepared an Impact Statement detailing the effects of cuts in local and federal funds. To voice our concerns, we have invited the members of Rhode Island's Congressional Delegation to attend and participate in today's informational session. It is our hope that information gained through visits to selected sites and from the Impact Statement will provide a basis for knowledgeable and sensitive discussion of the importance of continued funding for domestic programs.

As a group, Warwick Human Service Agencies participating in the Human Services Project offer programs to thousands of residents. Many of these people, particularly the youth, the elderly, the low and moderate-income residents, and those with special needs, may experience loss or reduction of some services as a result of the anticipated funding cuts. In all, $2,288,779 in federal and local funds is jeopardized. The imperiled funds support programs that provide food and shelter, substance abuse prevention and education programs, delinquency prevention programs, transportation and meal programs for senior citizens, alcoholism and mental health treatment programs, subsidized health care for the elderly, day care assistance, emergency housing, weatherization, fuel assistance, and youth employment programs, among others.

Of primary concern to the Human Service Providers is the impression that the proposed cuts will affect the entire spectrum of human services, whereby those with the greatest need will suffer the most. The federal budget cuts do not appear to be aimed at any particular special interest group, but rather weaken the foundation of core services, thereby threatening the quality of life for the entire community.

Proposed cuts will affect agencies and services both directly and indirectly. Among the directly funded programs, agencies will experience specific reductions for targeted services. Included in this category are: Community Service Block Grants, Medicare reimbursement, housing assistance for the poor, and funds channeled through the state government, such as the Governor's Justice Commission. Indirect effects occur as follows: the City of Warwick will lose $2 million in revenue sharing, which it uses for public safety programs. As a result, discretionary funds which were once distributed to human service agencies and other groups in the form of Contributive Support dollars may have to be reallocated to cover the deficit created by the loss of revenue sharing. Additionally, the City of Warwick expects to lose $250,000 of its $750,000 in Community Development funds, which are passed on to the community through many of the Human Service Providers.

Warwick's Human Service Providers are not asking for special treatment, but rather to be considered fairly in the budget consideration and decision making process. We ask that the federal budget not be balanced at the expense of the elderly, the low and moderate-income families, those with special needs, and the children in our community. We ask that, after reviewing the Impact Statement and participating in today's program, the members of the Congressional Delegation re-assess the priorities and defend the safety of human services and domestic programs.

REPORT FROM PRESIDENT REAGAN REGARDING USE OF AIR AND NAVAL FORCES IN LIBYA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, as President pro tempore, I have just received from the President his report consistent with the War Powers Resolution regarding use of air and naval forces in Libya.

I am submitting this report to the Senate for its review and I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 16, 1986.

HON. STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore of the Senate,
Washington, DC

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Commencing at about 7:00 p.m. (EST) on April 14, air and naval forces of the United States conducted simultaneous bombing strikes on headquarters, terrorist facilities and military installations that support Libyan subversive activities. These strikes were completed by approximately 7:30 p.m. (EST).

The United States Air Force element, which launched from bases in the United Kingdom, struck targets at Tripoli Military Air Field, Tarabulus (Aziziyah) Barracks, and Sidi Bilal Terrorist Training Camp. The United States Navy element, which launched from the USS Coral Sea and the USS America, struck targets at Benina Military Air Field and Benghazi Military Barracks. One F-111 with its two crew members is missing. These targets were carefully chosen, both for their direct linkage to Libyan support of terrorist activities and for the purpose of minimizing collateral damage and injury to innocent civilians.

These strikes were conducted in the exercise of our right of self-defense under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. This necessary and appropriate action was a preemptive strike, directed against the Libyan terrorist infrastructure and designed to deter acts of terrrorism by Libya, such as the Libyan-ordered bombing of a discotheque in West Berlin on April 5. Libya's cowardly and murderous act resulted in the death of two innocent people—an American soldier and a young Turkish woman—and the wounding of 50 United States Armed Forces personnel and 180 other innocent persons. This was the latest in a long series of terrorist attacks against United States installations, diplomats and citizens carried out or attempted with the support and direction of Mu'ammar Qadhafi.

Should Libyan-sponsored terrorist attacks against United States citizens not cease, we will take appropriate measures necessary to protect United States citizens in the exercise of our right of self-defense.

In accordance with my desire that Congress be informed on this matter, and consistent with the War Powers Resolution, I am providing this report on the employment of the United States Armed Forces. These self-defense measures were undertaken pursuant to my authority under the Constitution, including my authority as Commander in Chief of United States Armed Forces.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

NOT VOTING—2

Goldwater	Hawkins

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 44, the nays are 54. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BYRD, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SCHEDULE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I take the floor now to ask the distinguished majority leader what the program is for the remainder of the day; what the situation may be, as he sees it, with respect to rollcall votes; how late the Senate will be in session today; the schedule for tomorrow; and, finally, with reference to Friday, whether he anticipates a session with votes and, if so, on what legislation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, what we would liked to do now, if we can get an agreement, is this: A number of Senators wanted to make statements on the pending motion to proceed. As I understand it, the distinguished Senator from Iowa wanted 1 hour.

Does the Senator from Iowa want 1 hour on S. 1774?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I would rather not have a time limit, because we would like to speak to the point that we thought we were going to do the day before and did not get an opportunity to do. So I would rather not have any limit at this point.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished majority leader that on this side, I think we have cleared a unanimous-consent agreement that there be 2 hours of debate.

Mr. METZENBAUM. One hour.

Mr. BYRD. I am reading the memorandum.

There would be 2 hours of debate only in relation to S. 1774, to be equally divided between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] or their designees; and that during the 2 hours, it not be in order to file a cloture motion with respect to S. 1774 or the motion to proceed thereto.

Mr. DOLE. I hope we can have that agreement. Without that agreement, as I understand it, the pending business is the hydrolicensing bill, and no debate would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. I think 2 hours would be adequate. I do not know how many Members are going to speak.

Can we go ahead and make the request—that there be 2 hours of debate only in relation to S. 1774, the Hobbs Act, to be equally divided between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM]?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—under the current position, we would have returned automatically to the hydrorelicensing bill. Is it the intention that it be temporarily set aside and that we will return to the hydrorelicensing bill upon the expiration of this time?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. McCLURE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. As I understand it, there would be 2 hours on the measure, but 1 hour would be equally controlled by Mr. METZENBAUM and Mr. GRASSLEY.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. GRASSLEY would have 1 hour, and Mr. METZENBAUM and Mr. SPECTER would have the other hour.

Mr. METZENBAUM. That will be fine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. That would include that there would be no cloture motion filed during that period.

Prior to doing that, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida may proceed for 5 minutes as in morning business.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Florida will indulge us, could we get a response from the majority leader, if he is ready to respond to my unquiry?

Mr. DOLE. Following the debate on S. 1774, we will return to the hydrorelicensing bill, unless we can get some agreement that we will finally have a vote.

It seems to me that we have been on this bill now for some time. It is very important to about 99 Members in this body and apparently not so important to 1.

If we can reach some agreement to vote at a time certain on the Melcher amendment, whether it is Friday or Monday, then we could do it. Otherwise, I do not have any recourse except to go back on that bill and proceed as long as necessary. If we can get some agreement on the pending amendments to the crime bill and if we can complete action on Federal Deposit Insurance Act and the bankruptcy judges bill, it may be that we could avoid a Friday session.

We are in the process of working with the distinguished minority leader trying to clear these bills on each side.

Mr. BYRD. Is the majority leader in position to indicate what he foresees by way of rollcall votes today and the clock running as to whether we are having rollcall votes, say, after 6 o'clock, whatever?

Mr. DOLE. I think it may depend on the conversations taking place near here between the distinguished Senator from Idaho and the distinguished Senator from Montana. I do not want any rollcall votes if they are not necessary. I would like not to stay late this evening. But, on the other hand, if we do not complete action on the hydro bill, if we start on the budget fairly soon, it is going to be out of the picture for probably 2 or 3 weeks.

I just hope we could go ahead and work our will on that legislation.

Mr. BYRD. Then, do I understand the distinguished majority leader to indicate there is not likely to be any rollcall votes after, say, 6 o'clock today?

Mr. DOLE. If I could visit with my colleagues here, I will maybe make that statement by 2 o'clock.

Mr. BYRD. Sure.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we are 1 day past the date for action on a budget resolution. Although the resolution has been reported, it has not yet been brought to the floor for debate.

What that means, Mr. President, is that the time of budget temptation has begun. The longer we wait, the greater the temptation to persuade ourselves nothing at all needs to be done.

Already, we have heard claims that lower oil prices and lower interest rates will take care of the Federal deficit. Outside events, some argue, will make the hard choices unnecessary, a budget irrelevant, and time a luxury we can use without worry.

The facts are exactly the opposite.

CBO's baseline, published in February, shows the deficit for fiscal year 1987 to be $183 billion.

Since that time we have passed last year's reconciliation bill which will save $9 billion in 1987 reducing the deficit to $174 billion.

However, the $174 billion deficit is not the base that will be used to see if a sequester is necessary.

The Gramm-Rudman base assumes that last year's appropriations levels would remain in force in 1987 if no appropriation bills have been passed at the time the sequester snapshot is taken.

This would mean that budget authority for defense would start at $287 billion and then be cut below that level by the sequester.

CBO has just estimated that the 1987 deficit in the August snapshot would be $162 billion.

However, CBO indicates that this estimate is based on the economic forecast it constructed in February.

Suggestions have been made that lower inflation, lower interest rates, and lower oil prices that were in the CBO forecast will reduce fiscal year 1987 spending so much that a sequester will no longer be triggered.

However, this is not the whole picture. While it is true that these changes would reduce the spending forecast for 1987, they ignore the major changes in the economic factors which lower revenues and raise the deficit.

Lower revenues are already projected in 1987 because of lower real economic growth to date. Lower 1987 revenues also result from the same lower inflation projections which reduce the spending forecast.

In addition, lower oil prices will mean less windfall profits taxes on oil and less royalties from Outer Continental Shelf leases.

Together these re-estimates indicate that the deficit is likely to be between $166 and $174 billion in fiscal year 1987, well above the $154 billion trigger level.

Mr. President, the gist of all this is that even with falling oil prices, even with the current lower inflation, we are still looking at a sequester of between $22 billion and $30 billion. We simply must act on a budget.

A sequester of this magnitude would lead to a defense budget authority level of between $267 and $273 billion. This is about $25 billion below the budget resolution level and $50 billion below the President's request.

Under a sequester, civilian, military, and tier II railroad retirement benefits would have COLA's frozen for a second year in a row.

Nondefense budget authority would probably be cut by at least $20 to $25 billion.

Some programs, such as dislocated workers training and summer youth employment would be hit much harder than that.

Tomorrow, the Commerce Department will release the growth rate of the economy for the first quarter of 1986, and most analysts expect around 2 percent growth even though the CBO forecast assumes 4.4 percent.

If this spread of 2.4 percent is indeed correct, the deficit projection would rise by about another $2 billion.

We must act on the budget. If we have economic improvement it is based on at least in major part on the perception that Congress is serious about cutting deficits.

We made a promise to cut deficits, and interest rates have stayed down. We made a promise to cut deficits and the stock market has taken off. If we break that promise now, we can turn all our good work into nothing more than a nice try.

Mr. President, I wish to include in the RECORD a table which will show what I have been talking about and will give us a projection or show that, in effect, we could see a defense cut anywhere from approximately $50 billion below the President's request, $25 billion below the joint budget resolution that we now have before us, and the other problems that could occur in many of our other programs such as dislocated worker training programs would be cut by 48 percent, summer youth employment cut by 23 percent.

So the reestimate takes into account lower inflation on both the spending and the revenue side. But since Gramm-Rudman sequester baseline assumes no inflation increases other than COLA's, the major impact of lower inflation is going to be a loss of income.

Mr. President, I think that people should take this into consideration when they think they can enjoy the luxury of thinking there will be no sequester and they can escape that because the employment looks like it is going to get better.

Figures tomorrow will probably tell us that we are not having the kind of growth that was projected by the administration or CBO, and all of this indicates to me that the Senate should be about its business in taking up the budget resolution and we should be debating that right now and not waiting or delaying on that.

I ask unanimous consent that the tables that I referred to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No budget resolution: sequester potential re-estimated

[Outlays, in billions of dollars]

Fiscal year 1987 CBO baseline deficit	183
Adjustments to yield sequester base:
COBRA	−9
Defense at $287 billion in BA	−8
Domestic frozen in fiscal year 1986 post-sequester budget authority	−3
Other	−1
Gramm-Rudman base deficit	162
Lower interests rates	−10
Social Security, other COLA's at 2.4 percent	−2
Subtotal	150
Lower windfall profits, offshore (Continental Shelf and naval petroleum reserve revenues)	+2
Lower revenues (lower inflation in 1986–87; CBO baseline real growth adjusted for lower growth to date)	+14 to +22
Sequester base deficit	166 to 174
Sequester trigger deficit	154
Maximum deficit amount	144
Sequestered outlays amount	22 to 30
Outlay reductions under sequestration:
1. COLA freeze for second year for civilian, military, railroad retirees	1
2. Defense outlays	10 to 15
3. Domestic outlays	10 to 15

Prepared by minority staff, Senate Budget Committee, Apr. 16, 1986.

Effects of sequester:

1. Civilian, military, railroad retirees (tier II): Second Consecutive year of COLA freeze.

2. Defense: Budget authority reduced by $14–$20 billion below $287, that is, budget authority equals $267 to $273 which is $22 to $28 billion below budget resolution, and $47 to $53 billion below President's request. Outlays cut $10 to $14 billion below $277, that is $263 to 267 billion.

3. Nondefense cut by $11 to $15 billion in outlays and at least $20 to $25 billion in budget authority.

Certain programs would be cut even more severely:

Dislocated workers training program cut by 48 percent below fiscal year 1986 program level.

Summer youth employment program cut by 23 percent below fiscal year 1986 program level.

These cuts occur because the 1986 program level was funded from carryover moneys as well as new budget authority. The 1987 sequester base is only equal to the 1986 new budget authority level. The sequester then cuts even below this very low base level.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the distinguished Senator from Iowa for yielding me time.

ANTIVIOLENCE AMENDMENT TO THE HOBBS ACT

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DENTON. I thank my friend, the distinguished Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, the content of this bill has been widely misrepresented in this country. I have had what I considered to be a very significant meeting with some labor union leaders in Birmingham, AL, not long ago in which their concept of this bill, a concept ingrained by a Washington AFL–CIO representative, was clearly erroneous. They had letters from lawyers saying some outrageous things about the intent of this bill. When I showed them the bill they were dumbstruck.

I really cannot understand how anyone who reads this bill, understanding the context of present law in which it is offered, can oppose it.

I have joined Senator GRASSLEY happily as a cosponsor. I have been an original cosponsor of similar legislation in the 97th and 98th Congresses.

The crux of the matter, Mr. President, is that in 1973 a closely divided Supreme Court ruled that the Hobbs Act did not reach all violence but only violence that is "wrongful" in the sense that the extortionist did not have a lawful claim to the property that he sought to obtain.

This was in addressing union violence and prosecution therefor.

That misrepresentation, Mr. President, prevents the Hobbs Act from reaching actual or threatened use of violence directed at obtaining legitimate labor objectives or economic benefits. In other words, if higher wages are considered and should be considered a legitimate labor objective, present law permits violence to be used in pursuit of that legitimate objective.

As a result of Enmons, the Hobbs Act does not reach extortion, however, violent, in those instances where the union can claim that its demand for property is a "legitimate union activity."

Mr. President, the growth of violence on the picket lines has reached dramatic proportions. According to Armand J. Thieblot, Jr., of the University of Maryland, and Thomas R. Haggard, of the University of South Carolina, "Labor violence is substantial, systematically applied, not diminishing, and the law tacitly allows unions wide latitude to use coercive techniques."

I am in no way implying that all unions would take advantage of this situation. I am saying that some have and that rank-and-file members, as I will develop later, can be victimized by the loopholes resulting from Enmons.

Statistics published by the Industrial Research Unit of the Wharton School of Business of the University of Pennsylvania revealed that there were at least 5,114 documented acts of violence committed on picket lines from 1975 to 1985. Those acts of violence were not isolated to any one area of the country but have been nationwide in scope. In fact, every State represented has experienced incidents of violence.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a State-by-State breakdown of the incidents of documented union violence be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the breakdown was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Since 1975 there have been:
27 documented incidents in Alaska.
68 documented incidents in Alabama.
44 documented incidents in Arkansas.
109 documented incidents in Arizona.
636 documented incidents in California.
48 documented incidents in Colorado.
108 documented incidents in Connecticut.
16 documented incidents in the District of Columbia.
13 documented incidents in Delaware.

31 documented incidents in Idaho.
137 documented incidents in Illinois.
128 documented incidents in Indiana.
18 documented incidents in Kansas.
249 documented incidents in Kentucky.
63 documented incidents in Louisiana.
91 documented incidents in Massachusetts.
43 documented incidents in Maryland.
21 documented incidents in Maine.
179 documented incidents in Michigan.
66 documented incidents in Minnesota.
215 documented incidents in Missouri.
28 documented incidents in Mississippi.
80 documented incidents in Montana.
40 documented incidents in North Carolina.
4 documented incidents in North Dakota.

12 documented incidents in New Hampshire.
183 documented incidents in New Jersey.
15 documented incidents in New Mexico.
70 documented incidents in Nevada.
264 documented incidents in New York.
289 documented incidents in Ohio.
118 documented incidents in Oklahoma.
68 documented incidents in Oregon.
488 documented incidents in Pennsylvania.
55 documented incidents in Rhode Island.

5 documented incidents in South Dakota.
219 documented incidents in Tennessee.
119 documented incidents in Texas.
8 documented incidents in Utah.
10 documented incidents in Vermont.
95 documented incidents in Virginia.
95 documented incidents in Washington.
123 documented incidents in West Virginia.
114 documented incidents in Wisconsin.
2 documented incidents in Wyoming.
8 incidents which could not be classified into one particular state.

Mr. DENTON. Incidentally, the list includes hundreds of instances in some States, 249 documented in Kentucky, 215 in Missouri, 264 in New York, 289 in Ohio, 488 in Pennsylvania, and I could go on, but the list will speak for itself.

Mr. President, this is not an antilabor union bill. This legislation is made necessary because of the loophole created in the Hobbs Act by the Supreme Court, by which violence is permitted, and also because organized crime figures have been allowed to obtain, under the guise of "legitimate union activities," personal gains through extortion of employees. Additionally, a corrupt union, under the direction of organized crime associates, could be used to commit violent acts against a nonunion business competitor. The organized crime-dominated union could simply claim that the violence took place in pursuit of a legitimate, nonprosecutable labor objective, such as a union organizing effort, when the actual purpose was to eliminate unwanted business competition for the syndicate. In such a case, the Government would find it nearly impossible to prove the absence of a legitimate goal, such as union organizing, that is protected by the Enmons decision.

Of course, the Enmons decision does not preclude charging racketeers under other Federal criminal statutes such as the RICO statutes but it does leave an unnecessary and unwelcome loophole in the Federal law of great significance. In some cases, there may be no interstate nexus to engender Federal jurisdiction. Federal prosecutors must then defer to prosecutions under State law, where penalties may be more lenient than those provided under the Hobbs Act. Additionally, in isolated cases local prosecutors may hesitate to file charges against powerful union or business leaders in their local communities.

Mr. President, S. 1774 would close that loophole by allowing criminal prosecution of individuals involved in violent, extortionate labor union tactics. And, in this case, it is union tactics since management is already prosecutable under the Hobbs Act. This would simply cover both sides. It would allow for the punishment of any individuals who use or threaten the use of force or violence or similar activities. It would retain the feature of keeping management prosecutable, creating a situation in which no distinction exists between management and employers, on the one hand, and labor union and employees, on the other. Accordingly, it is clear that the legislation applies to both acts of violence by labor union members if committed with the purpose of inducing the employer to pay higher wages for actual work, and to similar acts of violence by employers or their agents, intended to induce employees to abandon their bargaining demands. Moreover, the bill would disclaim any intent by Congress to exclude Federal jurisdiction in cases involving violent conduct "in the course of a legitimate business or labor dispute or in pursuit of a legitimate business or labor objective."

Moreover, passage of the bill would correct the clear implication of the Enmons decision that the legitimacy of the ends sought by union agents—contract concessions—exempts them from prosecution under the Hobbs Act for the use of wanton destruction as a means to force employers to accede to their demands. If we follow the "ends justifies the means" rationale of Enmons, we in effect condone the systematic destruction of property and the maiming or killing of innocent individuals in order to obtain higher wages or better fringe benefits for union members. And there are examples of just that having occurred.

The bill would not interfere in any legitimate fashion with the right of workers to strike for higher wages. Its provisions would come into effect only if a strike goes beyond the mere withholding of labor to include activities such as shooting, dynamiting, or arson directed against employers and nonstriking workers. The bill explicitly exempts minor incidental incursions. If a man in a picket line gets a couple of beers in him and takes a swing and smacks somebody on the nose and makes his nose bleed, no problem. That is not what this bill is addressing. The fact that the actions of a defendent caused only a minor bodily injury, or minor damage to property not exceeding $2,500, would be a bar to a prosecution under the bill. Additionally, the bill specifically provides that it is not intended to chill legitimate labor activity occurring during a labor dispute that does not involve extortion.

Mr. President, I believe that the legislation, which was recently endorsed by the President's Commission on Organized Crime, is of paramount importance. We need to treat all violence and extortion the same, without regard to who commits the crimes and without special exemptions and privileges for either business or labor. This legislation will accomplish this purpose.

I commend Senator GRASSLEY and the other Members of Congress who are endeavoring to free the workplaces of our Nation from violence.

We need the peacefulness that the bill would bring. We need the teamwork and cooperation I see developing between management and labor, perhaps for the first time, blossoming the way it is, with such an important payoff to the American public.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of S. 1774.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is a straightforward one—should extortionate violence be illegal under Federal law when committed by labor unions as it is when committed by anyone else? For me, the answer is obvious, if we are to have a nation of equal application of the criminal law.

This bill—S. 1774—would finally overturn the Supreme Court's misguided Enmons decisions of 13 years ago. By the narrowest of margins, the Enmons case held that extortionate means are justified by the legitimate collective bargaining end of better wages and benefits. In so doing, the 5-justice-majority stood the concept of a uniform criminal code on its head.

You will recall that the Enmons case centered around charges of sabotage and wanton destruction of property by a group of striking employees. Yet the Supreme Court incredibly held that while blowing up transformers and committing other acts of sabotage might have been Federal crimes under other circumstances, such acts were not Federal crimes if the employees were on strike for legitimate demands.

The decision centered on the Hobbs Act, the Federal antiextortion statute which has been on the books for about 40 years. Under the act, extortion is defined as the use of violence or the threat of violence to coerce someone into giving up property. In one form or another, such acts have been outlawed since 1934 by Federal law. Yet in the Enmons case, the narrowest of majorities suddenly decided that the use of violence as a means of coercing management is not extortion at all, but a perfectly legitimate bargaining tool in the eyes of the Federal courts.

I would like to point out to the Members of this body that no less a supporter of organized labor than William O. Douglas wrote the dissenting opinion in the Enmons case. He said: "Seeking higher wages is certainly not unlawful. But using violence to obtain them seems plainly within the scope of extortion."

Justice Douglas went on to say "Violence, whatever its precise objective, is a common device of extortion and is condemned by the Hobbs Act."

I do not see how anyone could disagree with Justice Douglas in this commonsense reasoning.

This latest effort on Hobbs Act reform is the culmination of many years of effort since the Enmons case was decided. Many bills have been introduced, and numerous hearings have been held. Often featuring shocking tales of extortionate labor violence.

We have heard testimony similar to the reign of terror directed against the A.T. Massey Coal Co. of West Virginia, which I detailed on this floor in a statement of October 18, 1985. After 5 years, the scorecard reads: 745 windshields broken, 1,677 truck tires destroyed, 178 coal trucks and other company vehicles burned or destroyed, 4 dynamitings destroying company equipment, 27 homes shot at or damaged, 86 employees hospitalized or injured, 1 person permanently disabled and 1 person, a truck driver, murdered by ambush of 27 high powered rifle shots through the cab of his truck.

Where was the sheriff or prosecuting attorney during all of this?

The shocking fact is that although the A.T. Massey Co. was able to obtain 23 Federal and State injunctions citing the United Mine Workers for numerous acts of violence and extortion, not one union member has been found guilty or fined for his actions. No more than a handful have been brought forward for prosecution.

I think its time we ask every Member of this Chamber this very simple question: Do they believe the ends justify the means under our criminal law? Or do they believe in the equal application of the criminal law across all segments of our society?

We know the arguments of our opponents. And we can dispose of most of them right at the outset.

We start by conceding that not all strike-related violence constitutes extortion. Not all strike-related violence is part of a plan nor serious enough to warrant a felony charge. Neither do I believe that someone who loses his temper and throws a punch or breaks a window during picketing should be treated as an extortionist, for purposes of Federal law.

My bill makes clear that this commonsense interpretation will be followed, and that exceptions will be made, and that minor acts of picket line violence are left to the States to handle.

This is not an antiunion measure. It is not even antistrike or antipicket. It is simply a law enforcement matter. And I would ask those that would oppose this amendment: Does any Member of this body honestly believe that the average rank-and-file union member thinks he can resort to violence in the streets as a mean of getting his way at the bargaining table?

Mr. President, this bill is no cause for concern on the part of the overwhelming bulk of union members who refuse to have any part of the type of violence in the Enmons case. This bill deals solely with willful destruction of property which reaches serious proportions.

Mr. President, I would like to add a personal note at this point. For 10 years between 1961 and 1971, I ran a drill press at the Waterloo Register Co. in Cedar Falls, IA. I was a card-carrying and dues-paying member of the International Association of Machinists. When my union went out on strike, I went out on strike with it. But the men and women that I worked with, and went out on strike with, did not believe that they had a right to use violence to get what they wanted, and I do not believe that the vast majority of America's working men and women union members do either. But we also know that there are some "bad apples" out there.

When these "bad apples" do decide to use violence to get their way at the bargaining table, there is little or nothing that can be done about it. If people being beaten up or having their property destroyed call for help from the local authorities, they are likely to find an elected county sheriff, and elected prosecutor, or the city police under the control of the elected mayor, unwilling to get involved in the controversy in a fair manner. And if they call the FBI, they will be told that the Federal Government's hands are tied because of the Enmons decision.

Mr. President, we are not talking about isolated incidents either. According to a 540-page study published by the industrial research unit of the prestigious Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, there were at least 4,350 acts of violence committed by union members from 1975 to 1984. Every State represented in this body has experienced incidents of union violence—violence that too often goes unpunished.

Mr. President, there are new developments on the outcry to overturn the Enmons decision. The President's Commission on Organized Crime recently reported to the President and the Attorney General on how the Enmons decision has aided the cancer of organized crime in this country. I would like to quote from the report:

> Under Enmons the result has been that the Hobbs Act provides a loophole that allows organized crime figures to obtain, under the guise of legitimate union activities, personal gains through the extortion of employees. Beyond this a union, under the direction of organized crime associates, could be used to commit violent acts against a nonunion business competitor. The organized crime-dominated union could claim that the violence took place in pursuit of a legitimate, nonprosecutable labor objective such as a union organizing effort, when the actual purpose was to eliminate unwanted business competition for the syndicate. In such a case, the Government would find it virtually impossible to prove the absence of a legitimate goal, i.e., union organizing, that is protected under Enmons.

Without this amendment, our citizens can continue to be victims of violence for economic gain, with no one there to protect them. I do not believe that is what Congress intended when it enacted the Hobbs Act. But that is what is happening today.

We have to return the meaning of the Hobbs Act to what it was intended to mean when it was enacted. As the author of the law—Congressman Hobbs—simply stated in 1943:

This bill is grounded on the bedrock principle that crime is crime, no matter who commits it; and that robbery is robbery and extortion is extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card.

Mr. President, I would suggest that Congressman Hobbs knew what he intended when he authored the law that bears his name, and its high time we followed that intent.

One final note, Mr. President, I know some in this body will misinterpret the motivations and objectives of this legislation. They will brand it as merely a club for the open-shop movement to employ in beating unions. I have tried to allay those concerns today. But if Members view it that way, I am afraid it will be a sorry day for organized labor within this country.

Mr. President, the Department of Justice in a letter dated April 11, 1986, said that they strongly support this legislation. I have a copy of that letter. It was received by Senator THURMOND on Friday last. It was signed by Assistant Attorney General Bolton. A copy of this letter is on each Member's desk. I would hope that they would read the letter.

I would like to read parts of this letter.

Dear Mr. Chairman: This is a comment by the Department of Justice on S. 1774, a bill "[t]o amend section 1951 of title 18 of the United States Code, and for other purposes."

RECOMMENDATION

The Department of Justice recommends enactment of this legislation with a suggested amendment. This bill and the amendment would nullify the effect of United States v. Enmons, 410 U.S. 396 (1973). The legislation makes clear that the Hobbs Act punishes the actual or threatened use of force or violence to obtain property without regard to the legitimacy of the extortionist's claim to such property as part of a labor-management dispute. It also adopts the recommendation made by the Department of Justice in its comments on S. 462 in the 98th Congress, namely, that the statutory exception for minor violence which is incidental to peaceful picketing and not intended to obtain property be litigated as a bar to prosecution rather than an affirmative defense.

I would go on to quote elsewhere in the letter a second point that the assistant attorney general makes.

The Court held in Enmons that the Hobbs Act does not proscribe violence committed during a lawful strike for the purpose of achieving legitimate collective-bargaining objectives, such as higher wages for genuine services that the employer seeks. By its focus on the objectives of the property claimant who uses force or violence to achieve his goals, the Enmons decision has had several unfortunate results which make legislation overturning it necessary. First, it has deprived the federal government of the ability to punish significant acts of extortionate violence when they occur in a labor-management context. Although other federal statutes proscribe the use of specific devices or the use of the channels of commerce in accomplishing the underlying act of extortionate violence, only the Hobbs Act proscribes a localized act of extortionate violence whose economic effect is to disrupt the channels of commerce. The Justice Department does not view other federal statutes as adequate vehicles for avoiding the full effect of the Enmons decision. Although the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 added new offenses which can reach violence in labor disputes in certain cases, the Hobbs Act continues to be the statute of most general application to labor-management violence.

Although we support the efforts of State and local law enforcement authorities in their attempt to punish labor-management violence by the means which are available to them, we think that the federal government has a responsibility to assist State and local authorities in those instances of serious, extortionate violence which disrupt the collective bargaining process just as the federal government is able to provide assistance in other situations where the underlying acts of violence are also violations of State law.

Second, the rationale of the Enmons decision is not consistent with federal labor law. Although Enmons states that the "wrongful" use of force, violence, or fear under the Hobbs Act is judged by the standard of "wrongful" goals, the use of force or violence itself, apart from the user's ultimate objectives, is "wrongful" under federal labor law.

Quoting elsewhere, a third point:

Third, the Enmons decision forces prosecutors to consider fine questions of whether or not the labor goals sought by those persons making property demands are otherwise legitimate under federal labor law.

Quoting further:

Finally, parties to labor-management disputes are afforded an exemption from the statute's broad proscription against violence which is not available to any other group in society.

The proposed amendment of 18 U.S.C. 1951 would make clear that the Hobbs Act punishes the actual or threatened use of force and violence which is calculated to obtain property without regard to whether or not the extortionist has a colorable claim to such property and without regard to his status as a labor representative, businessman, or private citizen.

The proposed definition of extortion in subsection (b)(2) of 18 U.S.C. 1951 clearly distinguishes the "use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear thereof" from the "wrongful use of fear not involving force or violence" as independent predicates of prosecution. Economic coercion by labor unions in the form of strikes and work stoppages during the course of otherwise peaceful labor disputes is recognized as an appropriate means of achieving legitimate labor objectives. The proposed definition of extortion makes clear that property demands in the form of wages for necessary labor and legitimate employment benefits could never become the subject of a Hobbs Act prosecution when such demands were backed only by peaceful strikes, work stoppages and picketing.

The bar to prosecution in proposed subsection (d) of 18 U.S.C. 1951 is consistent with the view of the Department of Justice that minor, incidental violence which sometimes occurs in the course of a labor dispute among those at a picket line is not ordinarily designed for extortive purposes, * * * but generally arises from the emotional intensity of the participants to the dispute. Therefore, although it may be redundant as a technical matter to state the position that minor, incidental picket line violence is not subject to the Hobbs Act, the Department agrees with the drafters of the bill that this position should be expressed in the statute in order to allay the concerns of those who may feel that the statute might otherwise be applied to incidents of picket line violence and not just to clear cases of extortion.

By formulation of the defense as a bar to prosecution rather than as an affirmative defense, the issues relevant to these criteria can be disposed of at an earlier stage of prosecution—preferably, through pre-trial motions. The earlier resolution of these issues would benefit defendants who have a valid claim that the Hobbs Act is inapplicable to their case.

That letter from which I have quoted excerpts is signed by John R. Bolton, Assistant Attorney General.

The President's Commission on Organized Crime, in its comprehensive report to the President and the Attorney General, very recently came out in favor of overturning the Enmons decision.

I would like, Mr. President, at this time to read from the report, which sees amending the Hobbs Act as a key to its battle against organized crime.

The third point that the report makes:

Congress should amend the Federal antiextortion statute (Hobbs Act) to authorize prosecutions for the actual or threatened use of violence irrespective of whether such conduct is in furtherance of a legitimate labor objective.

In 1973, in U.S. v. Enmons, a Hobbs Act prosecution for violent conduct during the course of a labor dispute, a closely divided Supreme Court held that the Hobbs Act did not reach all violence, but only violence that is wrongful in the sense that the extortionist did not have a lawful claim to the property he sought to obtain. Under this interpretation, the Hobbs Act does not reach the actual or threatened use of violence directed at obtaining a legitimate labor objective or economic benefits that can otherwise be lawfully obtained by collective bargaining. As a result of Enmons, the Hobbs Act does not reach extortion, however violent, in those instances where the union can claim that its demand for property is a legitimate union activity. The commission rejects the view that such violence should be exempted from the scope of Federal prosecutive authority.

I think we need to emphasize that, Mr. President, because this is the President's Commission on Organized Crime, entitled "The Edge: Organized Crime, Business, and Labor Unions."

Let me repeat:

The Commission rejects the view that such violence—which was OK'd by the Enmons case in a 5 to 4 decision in 1972—should be exempted from the scope of Federal prosecutive authority.

During hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. Senate on proposed Hobbs Act revisions in 1984, the FBI's Deputy Assistant Director of Criminal Investigations, Floyd I. Clark, testified about the impact of the Enmons case on Federal law enforcement.

I quote from Mr. Clark:

The increased demands for the employer to pay money to the union or to its associated funds provides the organized crime figure with an increased power or financial base which can be used by the organized crime figures who might have access to those union funds through embezzlement. And they provide jobs to organized crime figures despite the fact that they do not work, sometimes referred to as "no shows." In many instances, the union official extorts the employer for alleged legitimate union demands and then through some of his previously described methods, uses these payments for this own personal benefit.

I want to emphasize at this point, quoting again from the President's commission report:

Under Enmons, the result has been that the Hobbs Act provides a loophole that allows organized crime figures to obtain, under the guise of legitimate union activities, personal gains through the extortion of employees. Beyond this, a union, under the direction of organized crime associates, could be used to commit violent acts against a nonunion business competitor.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GRASSLEY. No. I shall be glad to when I have done with my statement, because I do not want to be interrupted.

The organized crime-dominated union could claim that the violence took place in pursuit of a legitimate nonprosecutable effort such as a legitimate organizing effort when the actual purpose was to eliminate unwanted business. In such a case, the Government could find it virtually impossible to prove the absence of a legitimate goal—that is, union organizing—that is protected under Enmons. Enmons does not, of course, preclude charging racketeers under other Federal laws, but it does leave a unnecessary and unwelcome gap in Federal law.

In some cases, there may be no interstate nexus to provide Federal intervention. Federal prosecutors must defer to prosecutors under State law, where penalties may be more lenient than those under the Hobbs Act. In isolated cases, local prosecutors may hesitate to file charges against powerful union or business leaders in their own community. There is a strong Federal interest, recognized by Congress, which would be served by the Commission's proposed revisions of the Hobbs Act. The possibility of Federal prosecution ensures that organized crime cases in the labor area will, in fact, be investigated.

The President's Commission on Organized Crime has documented the pervasive influence of organized crime. The Commission has recommended that the Enmons loophole be closed as one way to fight back. It would be a shame if we, in the Senate, let this opportunity to actually do something slip away. Here is a chance to do something beyond mere rhetoric. I would say, let us give the FBI a tool that they can use to fight organized crime.

Mr. President, at this point in the debate, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a paper that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has prepared on Hobbs Act reform, entitled "Labor Violence—Setting the Record Straight."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOBBS ACT REFORM—S. 1774—LABOR VIOLENCE SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT

S. 1774 would amend the Hobbs Anti-Extortion Act of 1946, 18 U.S.C. Sec. 1951, to restore coverage to union members who intentionally commit or threaten violence for the purpose of extortion. Thus, S. 1774 would reverse legislatively the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Enmons, 410 U.S. 396 (1973), which exempts union members from the Hobbs Act provided their extortionate violence or threats are intended to further "legitimate union objectives" such as higher wages.

(1) Labor violence is a major problem:

Labor violence is a major problem in American society, one that annually is growing in frequency and severity. In the last ten years, 5,100 recorded incidents of labor violence have occurred during labor disputes, including more than 2,300 physical assaults and 66 murders. While strike activity is decreasing, labor violence is increasing. Significantly, labor violence has increased dramatically since the 1973 Enmons decision, a decision which exempted labor unions—and only labor unions—from the federal criminal statute on extortion, the Hobbs Act. A 1983 study of labor violence published by the Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania found that "violence in labor disputes is a peruasive, widespread and continuing problem." More importantly, the Wharton study concluded that for some unions labor violence has become an integral part of their collective bargaining strategy.

(2) Local police are not controlling picket line violence:

(a) Cannot—Local authorities often cannot take the steps necessary to prevent union violence and extortion. Local police often lack the personnel, equipment, or training and experience in crowd control to protect people and property from labor violence. Disputes often occur at remote locations where local authorities simply are too understaffed to keep the peace when faced with hundreds of strikers in an explosive atmosphere. Local authorities sometimes are prevented from apprehending and prosecuting criminals in labor disputes because of jurisdictional limitations. For example, union members may cross a state line late at night, destroy 20 company trucks, and slip back across the state line again, thus assuring immunity from both state and federal prosecution.

(b) Will not—Beyond when they cannot, local authorities often will not get involved in a labor dispute to protect individuals and property or to investigate crimes. Local sheriffs and prosecutors are most often elected officials. The political ramifications of being perceived to favor one side or the other in a labor dispute dissuade some authorities from upholding the law—even criminal law. One witness at the Senate hearings stated that he was told by the police that "the rule of thumb" for local police was not to become "involved" in labor violence unless a murder occurs. This tacit approval of labor union violence only serves to guarantee its recurrence. For local authorities to accord special deference to union violence, in conjunction with federal authorities being forced to accord complete priviledge and legal immunity to union violence, encourages more violence and perpetuation of the assumption that labor violence—no matter how injurious or destructive—is justified. Local police also often are unionized and their philosophical sympathies for union strikers may overcome their responsibilities to uphold the law. Furthermore, in all but one state, state authorities, more likely to have the manpower, equipment and training to keep the peace and less likely to allow political judgments to interfere, can only be summoned to help in a labor dispute by local police authorities and in one state—Montana—are prohibited by law from ever getting involved. As a practical matter, protection by state policy is seldom accorded.

(c) Are not—While S. 1774's opponents contend that local authorities can "handle" labor disturbances, the issue as to whether they can is somewhat moot. The real issue is whether local authorities are handling the labor violence problem in light of the dramatic annual increases in labor violence. Can local authorities handle picket line violence? Some can and some do. But most do not. No state and virtually no industry is immune from the growing problem of labor violence.

(3) Organized crime is a prime force behind labor violence:

Organized crime dominates at least four major international unions, is integrally involved in strategies for widespread and intentional use of labor violence and intimidation, and use the union exemption from the Hobbs Act as a shield from federal investigation and prosecution of its criminal activities. The President's Commission on Organized Crime reported that the Enmons decision has resulted in a Hobbs Act "loophole" that permits organized crime figures to extort employees and businesses "under the guide of legitimate union activities" without any chance of federal prosecution. Floyd Clark, Deputy Assistant Director of Criminal Investigations at the Federal Bureau of Investigation testified in 1984 that the Hobbs Act exemption effectively "provides the organized crime figure with an increased power or financial base." While most unions do not engage in labor violence and most union members are law-abiding, some unions are engaged in a deliberate program of labor violence and extortion in an unholy marriage of organized labor and organized crime which denies federal prosecution and shrouds the vilest criminal activity in a cloak of "legitimate" union objectives.

(4) There is a broad spectrum of victims of union violence including union members:

Labor violence often is directed at company property, the destruction of which is intended to keep the employer from operating during a strike and to intimidate the employer into settling the strike on the union's terms. More often extortionate acts are directed at individuals: managers, supervisors, and foremen; security personnel; replacement workers lawfully hired in accordance with the more than fifty-year old National Labor Relations Act; and union members crossing the picket line to return to work. The focus of collective bargaining in the 1980's has shifted from wages and benefits to job security. Employers have an almost absolute right to hire and retain replacement workers during an economic strike—a strike over wage and benefit issues rather than one regarding an allegation of an unfair labor practice. Workers for any number of reasons—they may feel they are treated fairly and paid well, may be close to retirement or vesting in a pension, may be up for promotion or in need of health benefits or may wish to preserve their job—may oppose a strike and wish to return to work. Crossing the picket line—their legal right—often becomes an invitation to harassment, threats, damage to their vehicles and homes, and assault of themselves and their families. Unlike management employees and property, these workers are not protected by security personnel most of the time. Because of their vulnerability, these workers become the targets of labor violence. The Wharton School study found that the amount of labor violence was inversely proportionate to the amount of support a strike or organizing drive had among employees. Thus, labor violence escalates when rank-and-file workers resist the union's demands.

(5) Hobbs Act reform is necessary to assure equal application of the law to business and labor:

Employers are subject to the Hobbs Act's prohibitions—and rightfully so. So are nonunion employees. The exemption carved out by the Court in Enmons—the only coverage exemption—applies only to union members. Management has, is and will continue to be subject to federal investigation and prosecution for any violent or extortionate behavior in or out of the collective bargaining process. S. 1774 seeks to restore the same coverage to union members as is applied to all other citizens and, in so doing, would accord equal application of—and protection by—our laws.

(6) S. 1774 merely restores the Hobbs Act to its original intent:

"Crime is crime no matter who commits it; and robbery is robbery and extortion, extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card," stated Congressman Samuel Hobbs in sponsoring the Anti-Extortion Act of 1946. With passage of the Hobbs Act, crime was crime and extortion was extortion—regardless of who committed it—from 1946 until 1973. The Hobbs Act was not even a legislative issue. However, the Enmons decision, by a 5-4 vote based on a strict constructionist view of the law which focused on the Hobbs Act's prohibition of extortion for "wrongful purposes," created a judicial loophole in contradiction of legislative intent. The Court failed to distinguish between legal and illegal efforts to obtain "legitimate" labor objectives such as higher wages. Thus acts illegal under federal law became legal, and violent acts or threats became legitimized. S. 1774 is a restorative measure, intended merely to return the Hobbs Act to its 1946-1973 status, restoring the law to Congress' original intent, and closing a unique exemption from a federal criminal statute.

(7) The Enmons decision is contrary to our national labor policies:

The federal government—through the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, the National Mediation Board, and the federal courts—has long been the principal regulator, arbitrator and judge of labor-management relations practices and procedures. To cede responsibility over those labor disputes involving labor violence—and only those labor disputes—to state law and local authorities is unprecedented and contrary to our long-standing and oft reaffirmed national labor policy of federal jurisdiction. Furthermore, the primary purpose of our nation's federal labor laws is to insure industrial peace and stability. The Enmons decision contradicts this national policy. Its effect since 1973 has been to escalate labor violence. The union exemption from the Hobbs Act in many instances has shifted the balance of power to organized labor during the negotiations and organizing drives by permitting acts or threats of violence without fear of federal investigation or prosecution. Provided a shield of immunity, unions increasingly have used extortion, rather than legitimate economic pressures, to create—without reprisal—an unlawful imbalance in labor-management relations. Among the victims of labor violence is our national policy of industrial peace and stability.

(8) There are safeguards in S. 1774 to ensure that legitimate union rights are preserved:

S. 1774 would not have a "chilling" effect on the legitimate exercise of union rights, interfere with lawful strike activity, single out union members for special treatment under federal law, penalize workers in minor picket line scuffles or destruction of property, or penalize impulsive acts of animal exuberance on the picket line.

A union member's violation of the Hobbs Act would require an intent to extort and a minimum of $2500 worth of damage or serious bodily injury. The restriction of coverage to intentional acts excludes the spontaneous picket line incident. The threshold dollar limitation excludes the slashed tire or smashed window. The bill specifically reaffirms Hobbs Act coverage for employers, twice asserting coverage when violence occurs during pursuit of a "legitimate business or labor objective." Furthermore, the concept of "property" which is obtained through extortion under the Hobbs Act has been interpreted in a broad sense by the courts, is not limited to physical or tangible property, does not require a direct benefit to the extortionist, and includes such management "benefits" as the ability to continue production or shipments, to solicit business, to maintain customer goodwill, or to obtain concessions in bargaining. Thus, coverage under the Hobbs Act truly would be uniform, and all parties to a labor dispute—employers, employees and labor organizations—would be held equally accountable under the law for injuries or destruction of property intentionally perpetrated.

(9) Reversal of the Enmons decision has been advocated by a broad range of neutral judicial bodies:

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice, the President's Commission on Organized Crime, and every U.S. Attorney General since the Supreme Court's decision in 1973 have advocated reversal of Enmons decision. The 5-4 Court decision included a dissent by Justice William O. Douglas that stated that "seeking higher wages is certainly not unlawful. But using violence to obtain them seems plainly within the scope of 'extortion' as used in the Act." A concurrence by Justice Blackmun stated, "If Congress wishes acts of that kind to be encompassed by a federal statute, it has the constitutional power in the interstate context to effect that result."

Congress should effect that result.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise in support of S. 1774, a bill to overturn the Enmons case. In this case, the Supreme Court held that acts of labor union violence may not be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act if committed in furtherance of "legitimate labor objectives." S. 1774 would enable Federal enforcement authorities to investigate and prosecute major acts of labor union violence under the Federal anti-extortion law.

A solid record has been established to document the need for this legislation. For instance, during hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1984, the FBI's Deputy Assistant Director of Criminal Investigations, Floyd I. Clark, testified that the Enmons decision had hampered law enforcement efforts to combat labor union violence. Studies have shown that instances of labor violence have increased dramatically as a result of the decision. Statistics compiled by the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania indicate that there were at least 4,350 acts of violence committed by labor unions from 1975 to 1984. In addition, the President's Commission on Organized Crime has recommended overturning Enmons, finding that labor violence is often instigated by organized crime.

Over the past several weeks, I have had the opportunity to meet with a number of victims of acts of labor-related violence which were not prosecuted because of the Enmons loophole. Perhaps even more than congressional hearings, studies, and reports, the tragic stories of these individuals provide strong justification for the legislation before us today.

I have listened to the concerns of labor unions opposed to the bill, but believe their fears are unfounded. This bill will not enable Federal law enforcement to weigh in against unions during labor negotiations every time a rock or bottle is thrown by a union member. What it will do is permit Federal prosecution when serious acts of violence are committed or threatened for the purpose of extorting some benefit from management. Indeed, pursuant to amendments approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Federal officials are completely barred from prosecuting minor picket-line violence.

Mr. President, this is the first time this legislation has been debated on the Senate floor, though it should be noted that the issue has been the subject of extensive consideration by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Indeed, in 1977, under the chairmanship of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, the Judiciary Committee reported a comprehensive Criminal Code reform bill which included a provision overturning the Enmons decision. The committee found in its report that "an employer who blows up a union office or causes a union official to be assaulted in order to instill fear and thereby obtain property of the union ought to be guilty under the act irrespective of whether the property could have been obtained lawfully through collective bargaining. And the same should be true in the reverse situation."

So there are already clear precedents for approving the legislation before us. It was in the legislation reported by the committee under the chairmanship of Senator KENNEDY, who is one of the leaders today in opposition. It seemed to me nothing has changed except his position.

I regret that the cloture vote failed, but am pleased to have been able to facilitate the issue's consideration. I am a cosponsor of this bill, as I was in the last Congress. If we had come within striking distance of invoking cloture, I would have supported staying on the motion to proceed and trying again. Unfortunately, supporters of the bill knew when it was scheduled that the chances of garnering 60 votes were remote.

I think that was the known factor but in any event we thought we should proceed. Had we had 55 votes instead of 45 votes, I would suggest that we pursue it further.

But I do believe it is important that the issue has been placed on the Senate's agenda to help make the public aware of the issue and the arguments and to give Senators an opportunity to state their positions and to be on record at least insofar as the motion to proceed is concerned.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the portion of the Senate Judiciary Committee's 1977 report which deals with the Hobbs Act be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The material appears on pages 621–625 of the report.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1977

(Report of the Committee on the Judiciary)

2. PRESENT FEDERAL LAW

A. The Hobbs Act

Perhaps the single most important extortion provision in current Federal law is the Hobbs Act, 18 U.S.C. 1951. The statute penalizes by up to twenty years in prison whoever "in any way or degree obstructs, delays, or affects commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in commerce, by . . . extortion or attempts or conspires so to do, or commits or threatens physical violence to any person or property in furtherance of a plan or purpose to do anything in violation of this section." The term "extortion" is defined to mean the "obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear, or under color of official right."

The statute has in the main been construed broadly. Thus, the Supreme Court has held that, in using the language "in any way or degree . . . affects commerce," the Hobbs Act manifested a "purpose to use all the constitutional power Congress has to punish interference with interstate commerce by extortion, robbery, or physical violence."[31] Similarly the courts have held that the term "fear" encompasses not only fear of violence but also fear of economic harm to the victim's property;[32] and the term "property" has been interpreted expansively to include a threat of interference with a potential right to solicit business.[33] Likewise, it is settled that one need receive no personal benefit from the conduct to be guilty under this section (for example, a union officer may be guilty if he uses extortionate means to secure benefits for his union).[34] The Hobbs Act has also been held applicable to a bank extortion offense, notwithstanding that the conduct was also punishable under the bank robbery statute, 18 U.S.C. 2113.[35]

With respect to the branch of the statute defining extortion as the "obtaining of property from another, with his consent, . . . under color of official right," the courts have held that this proscribes a distinct crime, applicable only to public officials or potential public officials (i.e., candidates), requiring no proof of the wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear.[36] In recent years, this branch of the statute has been increasingly utilized, with considerable success, in rooting out and punishing instances of official corruption.[37] However, as a practical matter, where a public official receives property to which neither he nor his office is entitled[38] from persons who pay, e.g., because of an understanding or custom that every person doing business with the city has to pay, it can usually be shown that the payment was made unwillingly because an implicit threat of force or fear. Where threats are used by a public official to extort money, it does not matter that the official action threatened was action that the official could legally take or even was duty-bound to take; the threat itself was wrongful and constituted extortion, since it deprived the victim of the right to an impartial determination of the issue on the merits.[39]

There is one area, however, in which the courts have narrowly construed the reach of the Hobbs Act. Despite the acknowledgment that a principal purpose of the Act is to reach labor racketeering.[40] the Supreme Court has held that it does not proscribe extortionate activities by employees or union officials in the course of a collective bargaining dispute where the objective of the extortion is to secure a benefit that legitimately could have been attained through collective bargaining.[41]

Some historical perspective and discussion is necessary to better understand the background and effect of this decision, which the Committee proposes to overturn. The Federal Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934 proscribed substantially the same conduct as does the present Hobbs act with one notable exception. The original statute excepted from its coverage "the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee." The Supreme court in United States v. Local 807[42] construed this exception to preclude punishment of members of a city truck-drivers union who had sought by threat of violance to procure wages from their employers for superfluous services.

In response, Congress enacted the present Hobbs Act, with a specific purpose, inter alia, to overrule the Local 807 case and to "eliminate any grounds for future judicial conclusions that Congress did not intend to cover the employer-employee relationship."[43] The legislative history of the Act makes clear that the measure was not intended to interfere with labor's right to strike and picket peacefully or to take any other legitimate concerted action.[44] Congress' intent was rather to protect interstate commerce from robbery and extortion perpetrated by anyone—including union members. As stated by the author of the Act, Representative Hobbs.[45]

This bill is grounded on the bedrock principle that crime is crime, no matter who commits it; and that robbery is robbery and extortion extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card. It covers whoever in any way or degree interferes with interstate or foreign commerce by robbery or extortion.

Subsequently, the Supreme Court held that Congress in the Hobbs Act had accomplished its purpose of overruling the result in the Local 807 case and upheld an indictment which charged a local union and its members with acts of extortion against an employer in an attempt to force him to consent to a union contract for certain maintenance work and thereby obtain his money, "in the form of wages to be paid for imposed, unwanted, superfluous and fictitious services of laborers." [46]

However, until recently no case had been prosecuted involving extortionate activities by unions, in the course of a dispute with an employer, designed to obtain property which could legitimately have been sought through the collective bargaining mechanism (e.g., higher wages for desired work). United States v. Enmons[47] was such a case. It involved acts of violence (including shooting weapons at transformers and blowing up a transformer station) committed by union officers in the course of a labor dispute with the company as to the terms of a new contract for genuine and desired services. The Supreme Court, dividing 5 to 4, held that the Hobbs Act did not reach such activity, on the ground that, since the objectives of the labor activity were lawful (albeit the means to accomplish them were not), the extortion did not constitute "wrongful" use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear.

This holding, which was based on the majority's reading of the legislative history concerning the extent of the Act's intended application to unions (a reading strongly disputed by the minority),[48] is apparently to be read as confined solely to the employer-employee context. It is at odds with the otherwise uniform construction of the statute as proscribing extortionate means, whether or not the end sought to be attained is legitimate (e.g., public official's demand for money to take lawful official action or to refrain from taking official action where he has discretion whether to do so).[49]

Apparently in part what motivated the Court in Enmons was the desire to avoid Federal Hobbs Act coverage over unlawful picket-line violence—usually the product of short tempers—in which minor but intentional damage is done to the property of the employer.[50] However, in the Committee's view such acts do not fall within the purview of the Hobbs Act (nor should they be Federally punishable) since there is no intent thereby to obtain the employer's property through the use of force and the acts do not in fact cause the employer to part with his property; in short, such isolated acts of violence do not partake of the nature of extortion.

As a result of the Supreme Court's holding in Enmons, the opportunity is created for unions or employers to cloak extortionate demands in the guise of an objective which could be legitimately sought through collective bargaining. For instance, rather than violate the Act (under Green) by seeking wages for superfluous services, unions may (under Enmons) demand and obtain with impunity inordinately high wages for the performance of existing and desired services through fear instilled by violence. Such a situation is, of course, highly undesirable. The thrust of an extortion statute should be to punish violent extortionate means to obtain the property of another regardless of the legality of the ends sought, and this principle should apply in the collective bargaining context as well as elsewhere. Thus, an employer who blows up a union office or causes a union official to be assaulted in order to instill fear and thereby obtain property of the union ought to be guilty under the Act irrespective of whether the property could have been obtained lawfully through collective bargaining. And the same should be true in the reverse situation. Accordingly, the Committee has proposed in effect to overturn the Enmons result by treating the parties engaged in a labor dispute no differently from other persons in terms of the applicable prohibitions under this section, which is limited to extortionate means involving actual or threatened violence.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, so there is no doubt about the matter. I would indicate again that we will not make any additional effort at this time to proceed to the consideration of S. 1774. I would think that the debate we had will at least raise the public impressions or at least their knowledge of what is at stake here, what the issues are, and if at some appropriate time later this year, if support should grow for the legislation, we will consider it again. But we plan to take no additional action at this time.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 15 minutes to be charged against the time under the control of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator is recognized.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Senator from Iowa and I appreciate what he is trying to do. The issue is not who favors violence in labor-management activities. We all oppose violence. The Senator from Pennsylvania, who made the motion, is opposed to violence. I am opposed to violence; the Senator from Iowa is opposed to violence. The 54–44 vote was not on the issue of violence in labor-management relations. The question is how do we effectively deal with this problem and are we effectively dealing with it now?

Justice Stewart, in the Enmons decision that is the basis for much of this discussion, noted that if the act were broadly interpreted, then, "The worker who threw a punch on a picket line or the striker who deflated the tires on his employer's truck would be subject to a Hobbs Act prosecution and the possibility of 20 years imprisonment and a $10,000 fine."

He denied that the language of the statute placed the Federal Government "in the business of policing the orderly conduct of restriction."

The reality is we do not have a serious problem in this country. It is not as good as we would like it to be. I am pleased to say that labor-management relations have moved in a constructive direction in this country. There is less and less violence. We meet around the table much more. That is what ought to be encouraged. We do not need a one-edged sword that comes in and intervenes in this process. Let me cite two experiences from Massac County, IL.

One was a case where we had violence, where some striking coal miners came to a coal loading dock and caused problems. I was called, and I called the superintendent of the State police and very shortly we had the State police there to calm things down. That is the way these things work ordinarily. I know of no instance that has been cited where that kind of State and local law enforcement is not adequate.

The second involved a hearing that we held in the Labor and Human Resources Committee on a strike in Massac County. I think some of those who called for the hearings felt it would show a pattern of labor violence. In fact it showed a labor union that was bending over backwards to avoid any difficulty.

State and local law enforcement people consider strike-related violence a nonissue. Ninety-eight percent, I am amazed to say, of all contract negotiations are settled without that kind of formal dispute. Of the remaining 2 percent—and I wish it were 1 percent of a half of 1 percent, but of the remaining 2 percent where you do have a strike, the overwhelming percentage is that they are peaceful and settled without any form of violence. So we are talking about a very, very small number.

Incidents of labor violence are so rare that the FBI does not publish statistics under this or any other related category in its annual crime report. The Justice Department declared in recent time, "By and large we simply have not found a reluctance" on the part of local officials to prosecute instances of labor-related violence.

In a survey taken in 1981 of law enforcement officials in this Nation, asking them what they thought the serious problems were, 68 percent considered burglary a top priority; 47 percent wished they could pursue the drug enforcement more aggressively. Robbery, rape, white-collar crime, fraud, child abuse, prostitution, and traffic violations all received some small ratings but not even 1 percent of State and local law enforcement officials mentioned strike-related violence as a problem needing additional resources.

So we are talking about something that is not a major problem in this country. The question is, if we do not have something that is a major problem, is there any necessity for the Federal Government to move in? I think the answer is fairly clear that it is not.

The other thing which this does that concerns me is that it gives an administration a one-edged sword that is used against labor but not against management. Frankly, we already have things out of balance. The appointees to the National Labor Relations Board, the OSHA Commissioners, some of the others, clearly have not had the sense of balance that we have had from an administration of either political party in the past. I am not just talking about the Johnson administration or the Kennedy administration or the Carter administration. I am talking also about the Eisenhower administration, the Nixon administration—Republican administrations. That lack of balance is not a healthy thing. That lack of balance is important.

Now, there is another problem here, and that is the problem of how far the Federal Government gets involved in these things. Particularly that is important in police work. In any other field we can get into a dispute about States rights, whether it is helpful for handicapped young people who need education, but where we draw the line there, while it is important in the lives of those young people, is not going to create some kind of monster. When you put more and more and more police authority in the Federal Government, then you have the potential of creating something that is not healthy at all. That I think we ought to be avoiding.

In addition to everything else, I would add as a final note we have passed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I voted for it. I think I did the right thing because we have to control Federal expenditures. But if we are saying to the FBI and law enforcement people and the Justice Department, "We are going to limit your resources but we are going to give you additional duties," that means they will spend less time on organized crime and other problems that come before Federal officials. So this just is not the direction we ought to be going.

Again, I have great respect for my colleague from Iowa. He is completely sincere in doing this. It is a judgment call, but my judgment is there is no necessity for this. There is no evidence that State and local law enforcement officials cannot handle the problem now. It gives the administration an imbalanced tool, a tool that will be used against labor, not against management, and it takes away from the FBI and Federal law enforcement officials the ability that they now have to deal with other problems. It just adds another burden without adding additional resources. And so I was pleased, frankly, with the vote we just had. I hope this settles this issue, and I hope we do not move in this direction.

Mr. President, I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I had asked the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] to yield for a question, and he had expressed his preference to finish his prepared text before doing so. I thank the distinguished Senator from Iowa for staying on the floor for a brief question and discussion.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield, since I am going to have to get to another meeting, if I may ask, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMON. Is 5 minutes adequate or would the Senator from Pennsylvania like more time than that?

Mr. SPECTER. I would prefer to take the floor in my own right if the Senator is finished.

Mr. SIMON. Let me yield my 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania and proceed from there.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, I had objected to the motion to proceed by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the majority leader, when that motion was made on Monday of this week, because of my concern about the very important issues posed in this amendment to the Hobbs Act. Following my objection to the majority leader's unanimous-consent request to proceed, the cloture motion was filed and earlier today was defeated by a vote of 44 in favor and 54 opposed.

On Monday and earlier today in morning business, I had expressed my concerns about this amendment on grounds that there were adequate remedies for prosecuting attorneys to handle cases involving union violence, and referred at some length to the prosecution which I handled as an assistant district attorney in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania versus Local 107 of the Teamsters, a case involving union violence in which six union officials were tried, convicted, and sent to jail. I made further reference to the opportunity, if a district attorney failed to act, to pursue the matter with the State attorney general or if the State attorney general and the district attorney refused to act, private counsel could petition the presiding judge under the law of Pennsylvania and many States and take over the prosecution of the case. I further expressed my concern about the chilling effect on legitimate first amendment rights. Peaceful picketing is protected under the first amendment, a very fundamental right.

Then I sought to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, when he came to the floor, about organized crime. The question I now pose to Senator GRASSLEY is this: Does not this bill apply to conduct which does not involve organized crime?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPECTER. The question is: Does not this bill apply to violence which does not involve organized crime?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPECTER. While Senator SIMON was speaking, Senator GRASSLEY and I engaged in an informal discussion—and I think this reduces the bill to its very rudimentary form, not that it is necessary to do so, because I think this body has already said, with 54 Senators voting "no" on cloture, that we are not going to take up the bill. But since the debate is proceeding, it is my concern that this bill makes it a Federal offense to have an assault and battery case on a picket line.

My question to Senator GRASSLEY is this: Is it not true that if you have a case of assault and battery on a picket line, it is a violation of this bill?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I hope I have made that very clear, not only in my statement but also as I read the supporting letter from the Attorney General, as they made it very clear that we did not intend to do that. We went that extra mile to guarantee that incidents like that would not be subject to the Federal statute. So I do not know how much more clear I can make it.

Mr. SPECTER. The difficulty is that the statement by the Attorney General does not state the law. The law is stated in the bill language. Even if the Senator from Iowa says that, as do the principal sponsors of the bill as a matter of legislative history, that does not contravene the clear-cut statement of the bill.

In our informal discussion, we talked about the provisions which were set forth, that "nothing in this section shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of the Congress"; then, in subsection (3), "to chill legitimate labor activity by authorizing Federal prosecution for offenses occurring during a labor dispute which do not involve extortion. This intent would preclude prosecution, under this section, of conduct which is incidental to peaceful picketing in the course of a legitimate labor dispute."

The difficulty is that as soon as you have assault and battery, someone will say it is not peaceful picketing, and the prosecution can be brought.

Then, subsection (d) says "It is a bar to a prosecution under this section that the conduct of the defendant—first, was incidental to peaceful picketing; second, consisted solely of minor bodily injury; third, was not intended to obtain property."

The difficulty is that under this language, if you are seeking property in a labor dispute as part of a settlement, which is a customary reason why there is picketing, you have to have all three of those items; and it is certainly within the purview of the language of this bill to include a simple assault and battery case, a fistfight, is it not?

Mr. GRASSLEY. The statute is very clear that it has to be wrongful.

Mr. SPECTER. Is not a punch in the nose wrongful?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I could take the Senator's question more seriously—and I know that it is a serious question from his point of view—if he were willing to admit that we have a problem when confronted with the facts of the Enmons case. That case involved a terrific amount of damage and harm done to individuals, yet the Supreme Court said that was all right—if the goals that were behind the extortion activity at that particular time were all right. The Supreme Court said that.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania were willing to tell me that he thinks that those instances should be prosecuted by Federal law, then I would say that he would make a case for the points he is bringing up. But he does not accept the premise that the Enmons case was wrongly decided.

Mr. SPECTER. The Supreme Court did not condone the conduct in that case. The Supreme Court said it did not fall under the provisions of the Federal statute. This Senator does not condone that conduct. This Senator is very much opposed to it. My long record as assistant district attorney in Pennsylvania, in the convictions in labor violence cases, supports what I am saying.

The issue is whether this language would permit prosecution of a simple assault and battery case, and I submit to the Senator that it does.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I do not know how I can make it any more clear cut. It does not.

Mr. SPECTER. What in the language of the statute precludes Federal prosecution, under this bill, of simple assault and battery?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Because it does not have extortion intent.

Mr. SPECTER. That is a jury question. That is a question to be decided by a jury, as to what is intended. That subjects somebody who engages in a fistfight on a picket line to a prosecution in the Federal court, arrest by the U.S. marshal, for a jury to decide the question of intent. That is a fact question.

Mr. GRASSLEY. There is a bar to prosecution in those instances.

Mr. SPECTER. But the bars to prosecution do not bar a fistfight. It says in subsection (c)(3) that it is peaceful picketing. But if you have a fistfight, that is not peaceful picketing.

If you look at subsection (d), you have to have all three. Again, you refer to peaceful picketing, so a fistfight is not peaceful picketing.

The gravamen of this bill amends the term "extortion," saying:

"The term 'extortion' means the obtaining of property from another, with his or her consent, induced by use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear thereof, or wrongful use of fear not involving force or violence, or under color of official right.".

That language says directly that extortion covers the use of actual force. A fistfight constitutes actual force, and that is the concern I have, and that is my objection.

If this bill went to organized crime—and I have started to ask the Senator the question about organized crime—if you have a limitation in this bill to organized crime, this Senator would take a very different view, as I said during the course of the hearings.

I compliment the Senator from Iowa for his tenacity in bringing the measure forward and for the hearings he has held. But I raise this point in this manner to put on the record what is the essence of this bill, and that is that it makes subject to Federal prosecution a fistfight on a union picket line, and I believe that is unwise.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that at this point we will have to part company. He has his point of view, and I have expressed my point of view. I have expressed the point that the Attorney General agrees with my point of view, and I have expressed the point that the President's Commission on Organized Crime agrees with my point of view. And from that point there just has to be honest disagreement of opinion. I do not know how else to handle it.

Mr. SPECTER. I will not take the time to go into the opinions of the Attorney General and the Commission on Crime, except that those views do not control in the face of clear statutory language to the contrary which is expressed in S. 1774.

I thank the Senator for remaining on the floor and engaging in this dialog because I think it sets the parameter, and certainly establishes the reasons, that I have objection to this bill and refuse to go along with the motion to proceed.

In essence, when the bill in its language says, "the term 'extortion' means force" period, an assault and battery case is force and the bars on prosecution do not preclude unpeaceful picketing. A fistfight is not peaceful picketing, and this bill would make it a violation of Federal law to have a fistfight. That is what the bill says and no amount of interpretation by the Attorney General or legislative history, even of the author of the bill, in the face of that language would change it.

If you want to amend this language to say that it does not cover assault and battery, simple assault and battery, that would do it. But this bill just makes it a Federal offense to have a fistfight, and I do not think that is an appropriate Federal case.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, at this point I yield to Senator THURMOND, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee who is in support of the legislation and happens to be a cosponsor of it as well.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 1774, a bill to amend the Hobbs Act. This particular measure was sponsored by Senator GRASSLEY and introduced on October 18, 1985; however, this issue has been the subject of several bills and received extensive review during the last few Congresses. In the 97th Congress, I introduced an almost identical measure, S. 2189. In the 98th Congress Senator GRASSLEY introduced S. 462 on which three hearings were held. Earlier in this Congress, Senator GRASSLEY introduced S. 300.

S. 1774 is necessary to undo the effects of the 1973 Supreme Court decision, United States versus Enmons, which drastically limited the application of the extortion provisions in the Hobbs Act with respect to violence which occurs during the course of a labor dispute. Violence or intimidation, regardless of its source, should never be used to disrupt commerce. The Hobbs Act, as originally written, was meant to apply to everyone; there was never any congressional intent to provide an exception for any group or individual. As Samuel Hobbs, the author of the act, stated at the time the bill was passed, "Crime is crime, no matter who commits it: robbery is robbery, and extortion extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card." S. 1774 would ensure that those union officials and their agents, who are not lawabiding, are subject to the same laws that apply to every other American.

Of course, the Federal Government should not become involved in relatively minor physical altercations and vandalism that may occur during a labor dispute in the wake of charged emotions or flared tempers. Where such action is insignificant to the overall coercive effect of the legitimate strike, it is not extortion. If, however, violence becomes a significant or overriding factor in settling commerce-related disputes, some governmental entity should step in to remedy the situation. If the State or local government fails to provide the remedy in these cases; or, where there is a clear Federal interest, then, the Federal Government should be empowered to act.

I feel that S. 1774, of which I am an original cosponsor, is an evenhanded approach, covering only the conduct legitimately within the Federal interest.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I also take this opportunity to thank Senator Thurmond for his help in this bill reaching the floor of the Senate for discussion.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time? We are under time control.

Mr. GRASSLEY. To be equally divided. The reason I am asking for it is that Senator METZENBAUM, who is hoping to be back to the floor to speak, asked that I put in a quorum call pending his return to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will call the roll and the time will be equally divided.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I rise to commend my friend from Iowa. I think that we are in his debt for his courage and tenacity in bringing to the floor this important piece of legislation. It is incredible to me that it should ever have been necessary for him to undertake this effort.

But in this democracy, perhaps the most hopeful aspect of our form of Government is that when one branch makes mistakes either that branch or another can correct those mistakes and the ultimate remedy lies with the people. The people can be heard through their elective representatives, taking action to correct inequities where they do exist, and no greater inequity can exist than where, as a matter of public policy, the United States has exempted from punishment violence that would otherwise be not only deplored but prosecuted simply on the basis that it is pursued and accomplished in pursuit of what is sought as a legitimate goal in the course of collective bargaining or of some labor dispute.

Mr. President, this is a nation in which we prize freedom. It is a nation in which we prize the ability of all segments of our society to be heard and if possible accomodated insofar as their just grievances and legitimate aims can be accommodated.

But in no place have we ever accorded to violence the dignity of legitimacy. To try to legitimize violence, for whatever end, as being legitimate, if it is in pursuit of collective bargaining goals, is to make a mockery of justice; and to say that if someone has a legitimate goal, any course of conduct, any means will be permitted in order to achieve it; that criminal activity, and criminal violence amounting to extortion within the commonly common law understood definition of that term, will be permitted and those who engage in it will be exonerated from criminal prosecution simply because what they seek to do has what we think to be a legitimate goal, the securing of better working conditions or higher wages.

Mr. President, That is not only nonsense, it is dangerous nonsense. It is to create a special exception for a special interest. And there is no justification for violence, not for the kind of deliberate violence that seeks to extort, not for any supposed legitimacy of purpose.

The fact that the Senator from Iowa is compelled to take this step to cure this inequity in our law is something of which we should be ashamed. But, more to the point, it is something that needs not only his attention but the active suport of all us who think that justice should be equal justice for all and that there is no justice if we allow some, under the color of legitimate labor aims, to escape justice and to engage in extortion.

It is really a very simply issue, Mr. President. Lawyers can entertain themselves with respect to the niceties that often cloud criminal prosecutions, but the fact is our law should be clear that no one will be permitted to engage in lawful extortion, a contradiction in terms.

So, Mr. President, I hope that this glaring defect, this really disgraceful exception to the kind of guarantee that our State laws and that our Federal laws should give to citizens, that they will not be subjected to violence for any purpose, that they will be protected against violence, I hope that this provision is swiftly removed from the law as the Senator from Iowa seeks to do. He has not only my support, but my earnest admiration. I hope that we will lose no time in seeing to it that his efforts are rewarded, as they should be. The existence of this provision, I think, is truly a blot on the American legal system.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and thank the Chair.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from California for his kind remarks about me, but I also want to thank him very much for his support of this legislation and his taking time from his busy schedule to speak those supporting words on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). Time has been yielded back.

Who seeks recognition?

Does the Senator from Iowa wish to have a quorum call?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may avail myself of 5 mintues of the time yielded back on this side of the issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I want to express my continued support for S. 1774, an amendment to the Hobbs Anti-Extortion Act of 1946 that would restore the coverage of that act to extortionate acts or threats of violence by labor unions.

I think—and I have been studying it for a bit since I have been a member of the Judiciary Committee—that it is necessary because of the Supreme Court's decision in the 1973 case of United States against Enmons. That decision has allowed some union members to engage in, even though most have perhaps no intent to do so, to engage in violence and threats of violence under this guise of pursuing "legitimate" union goals.

So I want to commend Senator GRASSLEY, in particular, for his efforts in bringing this measure to the floor. This legislation, I think, is important to close the loophole in the Hobbs Act which leaves Federal remedies for dealing with union violence, I think, inadequate.

Statistics show us that in the past decade more than 5,000 acts of violence have occurred during labor disputes. Many have been violent physical assaults, including 66 murders. All of those, of course, are not attributed to this decision or the correction of it. Most recently in Austin, MN, we have seen violence of harsh proportion. Certainly it has not been isolated in any one area of the country but is nationwide in scope.

The Federal Government, I believe, has the responsibility to assist State and local governments in those instances of serious extortion and violence just as the Federal Government is able to provide assistance in other situations where the underlying acts of violence are also violations of State law.

The entire area of labor law has been preempted by the Federal Government because of the importance of labor peace, and all of us share that goal of having labor peace in interstate commerce. It certainly does affect interstate commerce. The laws on that are so complete in our history.

The Court in the Enmons decision effectively applied an ends-justifies-the-means test in finding the labor unions' goals—and laudatory goals they are: higher wages and better working conditions—were not "wrongful purposes."

Therefore, Federal law did not apply to labor violence regardless of how destructive.

If we follow that rationale, in effect, we condone the systematic destruction of property, and the maiming and injury of innocent people in order to attain the very clear union goals of high wages or more adequate benefits for union members.

It is my view, Mr. President, that there is simply no place for violence or threats of violence in labor disputes by any party or on any side, that all people should be equal in the eyes of the law and the union employees should have the same standard applied to them as to nonunion employees. That should be the same in right-to-work States or nonright-to-work States. That is not the issue.

So this bill would restore equal coverage to all citizens.

I think it is so important that we realize the bill would not interfere in any way with the workers' right to strike. Minor acts of force or violence that do not involve extortion would not be subject to Federal prosecution under the Hobbs Act if we were to enact S. 1774 into law.

I want to share those things with my colleagues. I would urge support of S. 1774 having to do with Hobbs Act reform.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, during the past 10 years there have been more than 5,100 incidents of violence during labor disputes, including more than 2,300 physical assaults and 66 murders. Noticeably, the violence has increased since 1973 when the Supreme Court, in United States against Enmons, exempted labor unions, and labor unions only, from the Federal criminal statute on extortion known as the Hobbs Act.

The Enmons decision was based upon a literal interpretation of the Hobbs Act's prohibition against the use of violence or threats of violence to export "for wrongful purposes" something of value from someone else. The Court found that because such goals of labor unions as higher wages and improved working conditions were not "wrongful purposes" and were "legitimate labor objectives," Federal law was not applicable to threats of violence or actual violence, no matter how injurious or ruinous.

As a result of Enmons, labor union violence is now shielded from Federal investigation and prosecution. This means that union members who may have chosen not to strike, management and security personnel, and replacement employees are denied Federal protection. Company property and assets must also go unprotected.

Nearly everyone agrees that labor disputes should be settled in an atmosphere of negotiation. Violence and threats of violence have no place at the bargaining table or near it. In addition, union members should be held to the same standards which are applied to nonunion employers and employees.

Senator GRASSLEY and a number of my distinguished colleagues have prepared an amendment to the Hobbs Anti-Extortion Act of 1946 which merits the support of this body. S. 1774 would restore equal coverage for all people by removing the union members exemption from the Hobbs Act.

S. 1774 also restores the original congressional intent, which, in my opinion, was interpreted correctly from 1946 through 1973. By reversing the Enmons decision, S. 1774 corresponds with recommendations made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Justice, and the President's Commission on Original Crime.

It is vital that Congress adopt S. 1774. We must prevent members of organized crime from invoking the Hobbs Act exemption argument to cover their criminal activity. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this bill.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the issue before the Senate today is whether we should make assault and battery on a union picket line a Federal offense allowing a criminal prosecution in the Federal courts. Although I abhor criminal violence, whether it is a part of a labor dispute or otherwise, I cannot support cloture on S. 1774.

Certainly I am opposed to the use of criminal violence or coercion by anyone, including union officials. The question before this body, however, is not whether battery, assault and willful destruction of property during a labor dispute are crimes that should be punished. They are already crimes punishable under State law. There is no dispute that these wrongs should be promptly investigated, prosecuted, and their perpetrators given a proper sentence. Instead, we are focusing on whether the Federal Government should be intruding upon the historical responsibility of States and local governments to keep the peace.

The vast majority of labor disputes, over 98 percent, are settled without a strike. In the relatively few cases where a union member uses actual or threatened violence during a strike, the facts show that States and local officials make arrests and prosecute the perpetrators. S. 1774 amounts to Federal intrusion into the jurisdiction of our State and local governments, and I do not believe a convincing case has been made to justify such a major change in Federal-State jurisdiction.

I would remind my colleagues that there are many areas of law enforcement that have been left to the States. The 50 States now prosecute murderers, rapists, and robbers. Criminals who use guns to force the owner of a local convenience store to hand over his or her hard-earned money with rare exception are brought to justice by local law enforcement officials. In most cases, investigating and prosecuting these types of crimes is much more complex than pursuing the wrongs arising from labor disputes. The Federal Government, however, has recognized the interest of the States in keeping the peace and refrained from enacting laws that would bring most of these crimes before the Federal courts.

During my five terms in the Washington State house of representatives, I took part in many successful efforts to strengthen State laws limiting violent and criminal activity. In my 12 years as attorney general for the State of Washington, I had an opportunity to observe State law enforcement officers and local prosecutors enforcing statutes aimed at precluding incidents of violence, including labor-related violence. I can report to this body that State officials professionally and diligently handled their responsibilities in this area. My experience as a State legislator and attorney general has shown me that our State and local prosecutors are fully equipped to handle labor violence and have done an admirable job in this area of law enforcement.

Mr. President, let us be clear that union leaders are not now immune from Federal prosecution when the Federal Government does have an extraordinary interest in their activities. The U.S. Supreme Court has noted that the Hobbs Act presently reaches violence or threats of violence by union officials trying to obtain personal payoffs or to force an employer to put "ghost" workers on the payroll. Such acts would subject the union member to Federal prosecution, 20 years in prison, and a $10,000 fine.

The Federal Government also can bring an action against those who engage in serious union violence under a panoply of other Federal statutes. If there is evidence of a union or management conspiracy to conduct affairs through a pattern of racketeering, a Federal indictment can be brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act (RICO). If a union or management official uses explosives to injure people or destroy property, the Federal Government can prosecute under Federal criminal laws. Similarly, travel in interstate commerce to destroy property by fire is covered by the Travel Act. These types of violence now are covered by Federal laws, and a Federal indictment can be brought without regard as to whether the violence took place during the course of legitimate labor activities.

The activities addressed by the measure before us are the scuffles and property damage arising out of the emotion surrounding legitimate labor disputes—disputes over wage levels and benefits. These are assaults, batteries, breaches of the peace, and property crimes that are thoroughly addressed by State statutes. There have been suggestions by sources such as the President's Commission on Organized Crime that "(I)n isolated cases local prosecutors may hesitate to file charges against powerful union or business leaders in their legal communities." I would remind my colleagues, however, that most States have established procedures that allow the State attorney general to supercede the district attorney in cases where the district attorney fails or refuses to act. If the attorney general will not act, many States allow State courts to appoint "private prosecutors" to pursue those who use violence to obtain their ends.

Mr. President, given the generally admirable job local and State officials are doing enforcing State laws in this area, the Federal Government simply should not be in the business of policing the orderly conduct of labor disputes. The record is not sufficient for an extraordinary shift in Federal labor law or an unprecedented incursion by the Federal Government into the criminal jurisdiction of States and localities.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the Senate Judiciary Committee rejected similar legislation last fall when it considered Senator GRASSLEY's bill, S. 300.

As I did last year and in previous years when the committee considered this proposal, I oppose S. 1774's proposed expansion of Federal criminal jurisdiction in an area where it is not needed. I also oppose the subversion of the committee process that the introduction of this bill and its consideration here today represent.

First, let me say that violence should be prosecuted no matter who commits it. If an assault and battery, destruction of property or unlawful trespass occurs during a labor dispute, that action should be investigated promptly, it should be prosecuted, and if the elements of the crime are established, the perpetrator or perpetrators should be punished.

The proponents of this legislation act as though picket-line violence is not prosecuted. This is not true.

As a State's attorney, I prosecuted both labor and management as a result of incidents arising out of labor disputes. Based on that experience, I am convinced that State and local prosecutors are not only able, but better equipped than Federal prosecutors to handle picket-line violence.

It is ridiculous to ask Federal law enforcement agencies to take on responsibility for prosecuting crimes like assault and battery at a time when we are already asking those Federal agencies to stretch their law enforcement budget as far as they can.

The Hobbs Act establishes substantial penalties for Federal criminal extortion—up to 20 years imprisonment and up to $10,000 in fines. In 1973, the Supreme Court held in its decision in United States against Enmons that the Hobbs Act's prohibition against extortion does not extend to the use of physical violence or the threatened use of force in connection with an attempt, during a labor dispute, to achieve such legitimate objectives as better wages, better hours, and improved job conditions. The purpose of this bill is to overturn that decision by classifying such conduct as "extortion."

In the context of a labor dispute, violence or wrongdoing may be precipitated by either side—by a worker or union member seeking better wages or improved working conditions, or by an employer or supervisor seeking to extract concessions from the union.

It is a fundamental concept of law in this country that the law will be applied uniformly. Similarly, it is a fundamental tenet of labor law in this country that the Federal Government will not come down on the side of the labor union or of the employer during a labor dispute. This bill would turn both of those principles on their heads.

S. 1774 purports to be even handed. Its proponents argue that it will apply equally to management and to labor, and that it will not chill legitimate labor activity. These arguments ignore both the key to the legislation and the nature of a labor dispute. The bill defines extortion as the "obtaining of property from another . . . Because in a labor dispute an employer does not demand or obtain the property of his employees, the employer would not be subject to prosecution even if he, or others acting on his behalf, engaged in violent activities. Thus, in practice, if enacted, this bill would really only apply to unions and the working men and women they represent. If management engaged in the same conduct, in the same labor dispute, it would be presecuted under State and local laws, not under the Federal criminal extortion statute.

All such prosecutions should be left where they are now—in the capable hands of our State and local prosecutors.

S. 1774 proposes an unwarranted intrusion by the Federal Government on the prosecutorial authority of State and local Governments. As such, it should be rejected.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, with all due respect to Senators who oppose the pending legislation, I am obliged to say that I have tried by best to find one scintilla of rationale for their opposition to amending the Hobbs Act—and I have been unable to do so.

What does this bill propose, Mr. President? It simply proposes that Congress take action to put an end to the senseless violence perpetrated under the pretense of legitimate union activity. Passage of this bill would be a step in that direction by making it clear—to the courts and to the unions—that the Hobbs Act covers any extortionate force or violence that obstructs interstate commerce, regardless of whether that violence is committed in pursuit of so-called legitimate union objectives.

I find it impossible to comprehend how any Senator, no matter how much support he has received from labor union bosses, could oppose this civilized proposition. Mr. President, as my colleagues have pointed out, it was the Supreme Court's 1973 decision in United States versus Enmons that led to the tremendous amount of union violence over the past 13 years. In my state of North Carolina, where workers have the right to choose whether they wish to join a union, and where law and order are vigorously pursued, there have been more than 40 documented incidents of union violence during the past 10 years. In many other States there have been hundreds of incidents. In the country as a whole, there have been more than 5,000 incidents of union violence in the past decade.

Mr. President, I could stand here and describe in detail some of the more outrageous incidents that have occurred in North Carolina, but they are a matter of record, and I will not prolong the debate. They are identical to incidents in Alabama, in Alaska, in Arkansas—right down the alphabetical line—in all 50 States. There are episodes involving shotgun blasts into homes, knifings, arson, even murders.

Mr. President, these are criminal acts. No other face can be upon it. But the Supreme Court declared in a nonsensical ruling, that this criminality is somehow not covered by the Hobbs Act. The violent lawbreakers cannot be prosecuted under that act—according to the Court—because the crimes were committed in what the Court foolishly declared was the pursuit of "legitimate union objectives."

What an absurdity, Mr. President.

Mr. Justice Douglas understood the clear purpose of the Hobbs Act. He stated it in his dissent in the Enmons case:

> Seeking higher wages is certainly not unlawful. But using violence to obtain them seems plainly within the scope of "extortion" as used in the Act, just as is the use of violence to exact payment for no work or the use of violence to get a sham substitution for no work. The regime of violence, whatever its precise objective, is a common device of extortion and is condemned by the Act.

Congressman Hobbs also expressed the basis of the original act when it was introduced:

> This bill is grounded on the bedrock principle that crime is crime, no matter who commits it; and that robbery is robbery, and extortion is extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card. It covers whoever in any way or degree interferes with interstate or foreign commerce by robbery or extortion.

Hooray for Mr. Justice Douglas.

Mr. President, the pending bill would reverse the Supreme Court's absurd interpretation of the Hobbs Act and restore its true intent. Law-abiding citizens across America have a right to demand that Congress do precisely that.

Mr. President, my record as a Senator will show that I am unalterably opposed to the unnecessary Federal intervention into State and local matters. It has become apparent, however, that local politics can stand in the way of prosecution of labor-related violence. In its support of the bill, the President's Commission on Organized Crime found that "local prosecutors may hesitate to file charges against powerful union or business leaders in their local community." The Commission went on to state that "there is a strong Federal interest, recognized by Congress, which would be served by the Commission's proposed revision of the Hobbs Act." The FBI and Justice Department officials have observed that many local law enforcement official have observed that many local law enforcement officials are unevenly matched against a huge international union and lack the resources to bring to justice. Thus perpetrators of coercive union violence often go unpunished.

I suppose we will be hearing oratory from born-again States righters about the dangers of the Federal Government intruding into an area where it doesn't belong. We seldom if ever hear a defense of States rights from these orators. But when union bosses say jump, these orators ask only, how high? And then they jump. The fact is that most of the cosponsors of this bill are consistently and genuinely opposed to unnecessary Federal intervention in the private sector, but the key word is "unnecessary." Isn't it interesting that so many who so strongly support the plethora of Federal regulation of the private sector are suddenly so loathe to see the Federal Government step in to fight a nationwide problem of unchecked violence?

Mr. President, the statistical evidence demonstrate that the problem of extortionate labor violence is a serious national tragedy that has hit every State. All workers, both union and nonunion, are adversely affected by violent labor disputes. This amendment to the Hobbs Act is an antiviolence effort. It is designed to protect all workers.

The Department of Justice, the FBI, and the President's Commission on Organized Crime have expressed their support for an amendment to the Hobbs Act. I urge Senators who are truly concerned about the workers in their States to vote for this bill.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to express my support for Senate bill 1774, which seeks to amend the Hobbs Anti-Extortion Act so as to overturn a narrow 1973 Supreme Court interpretation and return authority over labor disputes involving extortionate force to this act's jurisdiction. I have been a cosponsor and supporter of this and similar legislation since coming to the Senate in 1983.

The President's Commission on Organized Crime recently recommended that Congress amend the Hobbs Act as this legislation would do. Moreover, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Justice, and every U.S. Attorney General to serve subsequent to the aforementioned Supreme Court decision, has supported amending the Hobbs Act as S. 1774 would.

As a consequence of the Supreme Court's 1973 Enmons decision, the use of force and violence by labor unions is not presently considered to be extortion under the Hobbs Act if such actions are undertaken in the furtherance of "legitimate" collective bargaining objectives. Similar extortionate actions are, however, illegal under Federal law in all other contexts. I, quite frankly, cannot see the justification for such a select exemption from Federal law, and further, believe there is a demonstrable need for congressional action to remedy this inequity, to preclude unwarranted and unlawful interference in the free flow of interstate commerce.

Currently State and local statutes are the only avenue available to address illegal strike-related activities, as the Enmons decision effectively removed these crimes from Federal purview. Consequently, problems arise in instances where the ability of these jurisdictions is not sufficient to satisfactorily deal with the illegal conduct of large, well-funded, well-organized labor unions. S. 1774 would remedy this situation by returning Federal authority over these occurrences—as was the standard prior to 1973.

I would also like to add, Mr. President, that actions incidental to the conduct of a legitimate labor dispute consisting solely of minor bodily injury, minor property damage, or the threat thereof, which are not intended to obtain property, would not be subjected to Federal prosecution with the passage of this legislation.

In conclusion, let me simply reiterate my support for S. 1774, support for returning the Hobbs Act to its intended role as a Federal prohibition against extortionate force and violence, and ultimately, support for a safer environment in which the resolution of legitimate labor disputes may be undertaken.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to vote for S. 1774 to revise the Supreme Court's erroneous interpretation of the Hobbs Act in the 1973 Enmons decision. Five of the nine Justices ruled in Enmons that union officials committing extortionate violence in pursuit of legitimate union objectives are exempt from prosecution under the Hobbs Act.

As a cosponsor of S. 1774, I have sought to eliminate this exemption, which I strongly believe has contributed to an unnecessarily high incidence of life-threatening assaults against American workers.

The Enmons case stemmed from a violent strike in Louisiana during which union agents shot up and dynamited electrical transformers and substations. The Federal Government attempted to prosecute the perpetrators under the Hobbs Act.

The basic issue before the High Court was whether severe acts of violence during the course of that strike could be construed as extortion, since wages, the object of the strike, were the property of the employer. Union attorneys argued that enforcement of the Hobbs Act would curtail their legitimate objectives to strike for better wages and working conditions.

Until Enmons, no one questioned the purpose of the Hobbs Act. Enacted in 1946 to curb a rising tide of violent labor-management disputes, the Hobbs Act was intended to make clear that taking another's property by force should be a crime, no matter what the objective. The overriding concern of Congress was to protect interstate commerce from violent labor-management disputes.

The Hobbs Act was designed to apply to all Americans. Congressman Samual Hobbs, the author of the bill, summed it up best with the words, "crime is crime no matter who commits it; and that robbery is robbery, and extortion is extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card."

Thus, prior to Enmons, it was commonly held that any actual or threatened use of force or violence to obtain property was a wrongful use of force or violence and therefore constituted extortion.

But in Enmons the Supreme Court radically departed from the intent of Congress, and took the position that the legitimacy of the ends sought by the union agents—namely, contract concessions—fully justified the use of wanton destruction as a means to force employers to accede to the demands. Thus, the Supreme Court's rationale in Enmons boiled down to an "ends justifies the means" philosophy.

I want to make it perfectly clear that legislation to correct the Enmons decision would not interfere with the right of workers to strike for higher wages. However, strikes which go beyond the mere withholding of labor to encompass shootings, dynamitings, and other terrorist tactics against employers and workers constitute extortion by any normal definition, and should be addressed by the Hobbs Act.

It has been argued here today and in our committee deliberation that strike-related crimes are punishable under numerous State and local laws. Also, many born-again States rights advocates argue that government should not be in the business of policing strikes. However, I find it ironic that many who support Federal regulation of so many aspects of American lives—including the regulation of private sector labor relations within the sovereign States through the National Labor Relations Act—should have a problem with making the Hobbs Act equally applicable to all Americans.

This peculiar blind spot with regard to labor violence has caused much needless suffering in my home State of Kentucky. The most recent coal strike in the eastern United States is a classic example. Last year, riflemen and saboteurs turned the coal-hauling roads into shooting galleries in the coal producing regions of Kentucky, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Virginia. The violence—violence fueled by the Enmons way of thinking—reached its awful zenith on May 29, when Hayes West, a 35 year old resident of Racoon, KY, and the father of two, was shot to death while driving his coal truck. Many local lawmen have been overwhelmed by the scope of the violence. Others, fearing political retaliation, have been slow to respond.

Of course, there are many other well-documented cases of such unpunished extortion, and of such senseless violence.

Ultimately, it is the overwhelming majority of American working men and women who pay the price of labor violence, either as consumers, or as actual victims.

I hope my distinguished colleagues will give the American public some relief from this national tragedy by voting in favor of S. 1774.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator GRASSLEY, as an original cosponsor of S. 1774, and I want to thank the majority leader, who is also a cosponsor, for allowing the full Senate an opportunity to consider this badly needed legislation.

Let us be clear at the outset, Mr. President. S. 1774 is intended to overturn the 1973 Supreme Court decision in United States against Enmons, in which a five-member majority of the Court ruled that the Hobbs Act does not proscribe extortion undertaken in pursuit of "legitimate union objectives." S. 1774 makes clear Congress intent to treat extortionate acts equally under the law, whether or not such acts are perpetrated by union members and whether or not those union members are participating in a strike or other legitimate union activity.

Passage of this legislation is essential if we are to reduce the incidence of union violence. During hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee, committee members heard testimony on a dozen incidents in as many States where small groups of union activists used violence to force compliance with their demands. One of the witnesses, Mike Ashby of Boundary County, ID, told the committee of firebombings, gun shots, rocks, and bottles being hurled at him and other nonstriking workers at the Louisiana Pacific Co. Moreover, the statistics which Senator DENTON listed in the RECORD last year indicate that between 1975 and 1984 there were at least 4,350 acts of violence committed by union members, with documented incidents occurring in every State in the Nation.

It was this kind of lawlessness, perpetrated by a few "bad apples" among the union members on strike at a Louisiana utility company, which the Supreme Court was asked to address in the Enmons case. In that case, the employees were out on strike seeking a new contract with the company. Some of the strikers fired high powered rifles at three company transformers, drained the oil from a company transformer, and blew up a transformer substation owned by the company. Under any other circumstances, destroying another's property to force compliance with demands for financial or other benefits would fall under the definition of extortion and may be punishable under Federal law.

In the Enmons case, however, the court ruled that the anti-extortion provisions of the Hobbs Act do not extend to cases in which violence is used "to achieve legitimate union objectives, such as higher wages . . ." The Court's majority looked closely at the statutory language and legislative history of the Hobbs Act and relied heavily on remakrs made by Representative Hobbs to support its ruling that the act was not intended to proscribe violence committed in the course of a strike.

I believe the brief exchange between Representatives Hobbs and Marcantonio, cited by the Court from the 1943 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, does not reflect accurately the intent of most proponents of the legislation with regard to the extent of the act's coverage. Most supporters of the Hobbs Act undoubtedly thought they were voting to eliminate the judicially created legal distinction between union and nonunion individuals who obstruct interstate commerce through extortionate acts. Unfortunately, the legislative history is clouded sufficiently to leave one confused about the sponsors' intentions with respect to the act's applicability to violence committed in the course of a strike.

Mr. President, it is time for Congress to make itself perfectly clear on this point. While S. 1774 is not intended to interfere with labor's right to strike and picket peacefully, it will extend Hobbs Act coverage to reach violence threatened or committed during a strike. It is intended to protect interstate commerce from robbery or extortion perpetrated by anyone, including union members.

Some will argue that the criminal activities which this bill addresses are best handled by State and local authorities and should not fall within the purview of Federal law enforcement officials of the Federal courts. While I strongly believe that law enforcement is the primary responsibility of State and local governments, I do not believe that the court's distinction between union and nonunion perpetrators of extortion should be allowed to stand any longer. Clearly, the Federal Government has a role to play in the prosecution of violent acts which disrupt interstate commerce, and individuals should not be able to claim immunity from such prosecution solely because they were involved in a labor-management dispute at the time the violence was committed.

It is important to note that this is not the first time the Senate has given serious consideration to Hobbs Act reform that would overturn the Enmons decision. In 1977, the Judiciary Committee reported out the "Criminal Code Reform Act," which included a provision similar to the bill we have before us today. I want to quote briefly from passages in that 1977 committee report concerning the need to overturn the Enmons decision:

This [Enmons] holding, which was based on the majority's reading of the legislative history . . . is at odds with the otherwise uniform construction of the statute as proscribing extortionate means, whether or not the end sought to be attained is legitimate.

And the report continues:

As a result of the Supreme Court's holding in Enmons, the opportunity is created for unions or employers to cloak extortionate demands in the guise of an objective which could be legitimately sought through collective-bargaining . . . The thrust of an extortion statute should be to punish violent extortionate means to obtain the property of another regardless of the legality of the ends sought, and this principle should apply in the collective-bargaining context as well as elsewhere.

And with regard to the effect of the committee's amendment, the report reads as follows:

Accordingly, the Committee has proposed in effect to overturn the Enmons result by treating the parties engaged in a labor dispute no differently from other persons in terms of the applicable prohibitions under this section, which is limited to extortionate means involving actual or threatened violence.

Mr. President, I believe the report makes clear the position of a majority of the Judiciary Committee members in 1977 with respect to the proper application of Federal extortion laws. I urge my colleagues to review this committee report because it spells out clearly the problem with the Court's interpretation of the Hobbs Act and includes strong, persuasive arguments in support of the legislative solution which is proposed in S. 1774.

Before closing, I want to reemphasize a very important point, Mr. President. The legislation we're considering today is not intended to, and would not, interfere with the right of union members to strike and picket peacefully in the course of a labor-management dispute. I know that many false and misleading charges will be made about the ramifications of this bill, and I want to be very clear on that point.

I have many good friends and supporters in Idaho who are proud of their membership in a strong and effective labor union. I value their support and will always work to protect their right to strike and picket peacefully as part of a concerted effort to obtain higher wages, better working conditions, or any other legitimate union objective. These people are hard working, law-abiding citizens who do not participate in or condone the strike-related violence we seek to proscribe today. I am confident that they would support the passage of this legislation because they realize that these acts of union violence are damaging to the interests and objectives of most union members.

Again, Mr. President, I want to congratulate Senator GRASSLEY for his leadership and perseverance on such an important issue. I also want to thank Senator THURMOND, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for supporting S. 1774 and cooperating with Senator GRASSLEY to get the bill to the Senate floor. Without the commitment of these Senators and the leadership and support of Senator DOLE, the majority leader, we wouldn't be here today considering this legislation, and I applaud them for their efforts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we are writing another chapter of the never ending saga of this body's failure to subscribe to an orderly legislative process. A process by which this Chamber, as a whole body, is supposed to consider proposed legislation which has been carefully studied, crafted, and fine tuned by a committee or committees of proper jurisdiction and expertise, and favorably reported out for this body's deliberation and consideration. A process which is to be bypassed only under extraordinary circumstances, marked by urgent need for Federal legislation, and an absence of adequate State legislation to handle a situation of crisis proportions.

There are no extraordinary circumstances addressed by this legislation. And there are, in every State, adequate statutes and enforcement mechanisms to address the problem this bill purports to address.

What we have here is a group, unhappy with the results in the Judiciary Committee, attempting to bypass the proper legislative process and to achieve on the floor what they failed to achieve in committee, this Congress or in any previous Congress. This objective is made all the worse when it is an attempt to pass poor legislation.

This legislation was defeated in the Judiciary Committee last September. It is totally inappropriate to consider it now on the Senate floor, particularly in an amended form not considered by the committee. Aside from its procedure weaknesses, the bill is unnecessary, unfair, and unwise. It is unnecessary because not a single wrong that would be made a Federal crime under this bill is not already subject to Federal, State, or local prosecution. It is unnecessary because the collective-bargaining process works in achieving peaceful resolution of collective-bargaining differences. Ninety-eight percent of contracts are agreed to without a strike. In the rare situation of a strike, an overwhelming percent of those are not accompanied by any violence.

In fact, instances of strike-related violence are so rare the FBI's annual crime report does not even list strike-related violence as a separate category of crime. The Treasury Department's report on all bombing incidents shows less than 2½ percent of such instances were "labor-related"—and that includes acts against workers and all allegations, even based on unverified reports.

The bill is unnecessary because there is no "wave of labor violence" that might justify this vast expansion of Federal criminal jurisdiction. In fact, the number of strikes and strike-related violence have decreased in the 13 years since the Enmons decision. Moreover, there is absolutely no evidence that State and local authorities are incapable of handling any and all strike-related violent situations. An examination of even the "worst case" scenarios cited by the backers of this bill proves that State and local authorities handle the situation—those guilty of acts of violence are arrested, prosecuted, and convicted by local authorities. And Federal authority is already available where it is needed. Labor officials are already prosecutable under the Hobbs Act when they commit extortionate acts—even when related to the collective-bargaining process, and they are being sent to jail under the Hobbs Act, as well as under a plethora of State statutes.

Not only is this legislation unnecessary—it is substantively unfair. Section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act flatly declares our national policy to be: "Encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection." Passage of this bill would take the Government out of encouraging collective bargaining and even take the Government out of the role of being neutral, and for the first time place the Government squarely on the side of management in labor disputes. By greatly expanding the definition of extortion to include incidental strike-related violence—even if provoked by management—the Federal Government under this legislation would weigh into the bargaining process against only one side—labor. That relates to the legal definition of extortion, and is at the crux of why this legislation is patently unfair. An employer—and his agents—could not be construed as "obtaining" property from employees during collective bargaining or a strike. They could never be subject to Hobbs Act prosecution, even if they deliberately provoked or engaged in violence. The sad fact is, sometimes companies engage in violence, sometimes unions engage in violence. But it makes no sense to amend the law so only one kind of violence is punishable by Federal law.

A good example of company sponsored violence is the case of George Johns, an ex-employee of a security firm which specialized in breaking strikes by provoking violence. Here is what he had to say about what his job entailed:

Our purpose was to break strikes. We knew how to provoke violence on the picket line. We tapped phones and conducted surveillance, we destroyed property. One time we destroyed $148,000 worth of lumber to break a strike. "We guaranteed our clients that we could get an injunction against the union in two weeks, and we never failed. "We used video cameras 24 hours a day, then we set about provoking violence from the strikers and getting it on film for the judge. For example, one of our guys would walk up to a striker—especially if he had on a wedding band—and say he had gone to bed with the guy's wife.

The point is not that since violence is used by both sides, it is tolerable—it is not. The point is that the solution to the rare instances of strike-related violence is not to amend a statute that will result in prosecuting only one party to the violence.

The legislation is not only unnecessary, and unfair, it is unwise. States and localities historically have had the responsibility of keeping the peace. Local violence is appropriately addressed and prosecuted at the local level. There is a total absence of any evidence that State and local law enforcement officials need additional Federal involvement—or that they even want it. Today, most judicial reformists urge a reduction in Federal causes of action. Our Federal courts are straining to meet current caseloads, and budget cuts jeopardize adequate delivery of judicial services. Nearly 60 percent of all cases filed by U.S. attorneys are dropped because the prosecutors do not have the time or the resources to handle them. Expanding this Federal cause of action, when our resources are already stretched to the breaking point and when all the evidence indicates the States are more than adequately handling strike-related violence hardly seems a prudent allocation of resources. Our Federal judicial resources would be better spent on uniquely Federal demands, adequately enforcing our already existing Federal statutes.

Some claim that S. 1774 is identical to the extortion provision contained in the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1979 that I supported. That claim is false: It is not the same language, not the same intent, not the same context, and would not have the same results.

The 1979 Criminal Code Reform was a sweeping overhaul of the Criminal Code, an ambitious attempt to reform the Code which fell short of the votes necessary for completed action. It was not a one-shot bill intended by its authors to be an antilabor prosecutorial weapon. The language in the crime package was substantially and significantly different. There had to be clear proof the violent conduct was engaged in for the purpose of causing death or severe bodily injury—a far different standard than S. 1774's exemption for only "minor" injury or damage. The most fundamental difference is that under the 1979 crime package, there would be a bar to prosecution unless the Attorney General proved the State was unable or unwilling to proceed with any equivalent prosecution. Under S. 1774, there is no such requirement. There is no concern with whether or not a State has acted. It would allow the Federal prosecutor to wade into the labor dispute irrespective of any need to intercede in the local dispute; he would be capable of prosecuting only one side—labor.

The provisions of the crime package were strictly intended to be a backup—if and only if a State was unwilling or unable to proceed with punishing acts of violence in a labor dispute. It was intended only to fill a potential void in law enforcement, not, as this bill would do, to create unnecessary duplication of effort and a waste of scarce judicial resources.

The imbalance of this "reform" is evident to those who know how worksite violence sometimes comes to pass. There is a fundamental problem with amending our laws to enable the Federal Government to prosecute only labor violence. Many instances of violence are intentionally committed by management. Why? Because if violence is committed, especially against company property, the public—and particularly a judge before whom the company goes to seek an injunction—will think it is labor instigated. The proponents of this legislation have seen fit to use anecdotal evidence of rare examples of union violence. I think it appropriate to include in the RECORD some of the equally rare—yet unreachable under the current Hobbs Act, or the amended revision before us—acts of management violence in a strike. The following information appeared in the October 1985 issue of the United Mine Workers Journal:

On Tuesday, March 15, 1985, over 1,000 United Mine Workers Association supporters stood near the gates of A. T. Massey Coal Company's strikebound Sprouse Creek Processing Plant, peacefully demonstrating against the company's use of strikebreakers.

Suddenly, a non-union truck driver raced down the road and slammed his 50-ton rig into a staggered blockade of parked trucks owned by United Mine Workers Association members. Ten vehicles were demolished.

A Massey spokesman "explained" the incident by saying the driver panicked after seeing United Mine Workers Association members brandishing guns—although reporters and state police on the scene denied seeing any union member carrying weapons.

The next day, four United Mine Workers Association members left the picket line to travel to a nearby community church.

As they drove up the road in a ford Escort, they found themselves "sandwiched" between two massive coal trucks. As the front driver slowed down, the driver in the rear rode the small car's bumper.

Then the rear driver rammed into the Escort, destroying the subcompact car and sending all four passengers to the hospital.

Later, a Massey spokesman again blamed the victims, claiming that the car's passengers had attacked the driver of the giant coal truck from the back seat of the tiny Escort.

The same day, with the four injured United Mine Workers Association members still in the hospital, the National Labor Relations Board obtained an injunction against the United Mine Workers Association.

Incidents like these are familiar to union members, who have seen the pattern repeated in strikes throughout the United States. Time after time, companies have found violence to be one of their most effective weapons in any strikebreaking campaign.

"Companies are able to reap enormous benefits from the use of violence," said President Richard Trumka.

"They can hire armed mercenaries to establish an atmosphere of violence."

"They also use the issue of violence to craft orchestrated Public-relations campaigns against unions in the media. "And, once they've established the image of unions as 'violent' organizations, they can escalate their campaign of terror and intimidation."

"There have even been cases of companies destroying their own equipment and casting the blame on union members, who want nothing more than to return to work with a fair and just contract."

Many retired miners remember the "mine wars" of the early 1900's, when coal companies imported hired armies of "gun thugs" who roamed the coalfields, hunting down union organizers and terrorizing mining communities. Mrs. Bertha Damron of North Matewan, WV, recalled:

My father had to stay in the hills to keep from getting shot by gun thugs while he was helping to organize the union.

The judges got unfair injunctions against us then, just like they do now. And the company kicked us out of our houses, so we lived in tents. It got so bad at the "Battle of Blair Mountain" that the company dropped bombs out of airplanes on the union men.

Union members have seen a resurgence of company violence in recent years.

While the tactics of intimidation and provocation aren't new, companies are investing big money in the lastest union-busting technology: Helicopters, surveillance equipment, searchlights, and even armored personnel carriers like the one found hidden in Massey's Sprouse Creek compound. "It makes you think about how it was in Vietnam," said Local Union 1440 member Larry "Mo" Mounts, who served in the U.S. Army in Vietnam.

I never thought I would see this happen here, with all the helicopters coming in.

What it boils down to is that the company is going to war with us because we want to keep our jobs.

Some of the guard companies that are using military hardware to break union strikes are routinely violating State laws.

Southeastern Securities and Investigation, Inc., was ordered out of West Virginia after a State investigation revealed that some of its employees patrolling A.T. Massey operations were convicted felons.

The same company is under investigation by authorities in New York State for possible illegal activities associated with strikebreaking efforts at a zinc mine owned by St. Joe Minerals Corp. St. Joe is a Flour Corp. subsidiary which manages Flour's interest in another subsidiary, A.T. Massey.

"It's clear the companies are working together to send their SWAT teams to break strikes" said Dick Corcoran of the United Steelworkers of America, which represents the workers at St. Joe's zinc mine in Balmat, NY. "That's why the unions have to get together to share information, so we can combat their tactics more effectively. And one way we can fight them is with political pressure."

Clayton Hafield of Local Union 1440 agrees. "We've got to keep the legal and political pressure on," he said. "They kicked Southeastern Securities out of West Virginia, but Massey just sent them over the river into Kentucky."

Even more than physical violence, companies wage a different kind of war against striking union members, especially if the strike is a long one.

That warfare is psychological, and its hardest hit victims are often those least able to defend themselves—the children and the elderly of the community, who find themselves caught in the middle of a combat zone. In school, children have been kept inside during recess because of the proximity of armed guards. They live in fear of speeding nonunion coal trucks, and sleep with their parents away from windows, afraid of sniper fire. "It's scary, real scary," said 12-year-old Charlie Dixon. "They shot up our house one night. We didn't get hurt because we'd gone over to my grandmothers.

"And last night, somebody shot up the union tent, and I was right across the road. It was awful, because my cousin and my uncle and my friends were over there." For elderly residents living near Massey's Sprouse Creek operation, the activities of the company's "security" guards leave them feeling much less secure.

"Those guards forced the Government to close our Post Office," said Mrs. Virginia Cantrell of Lobata, WV.

"It was in a company building and Massey built a fence around it, with barbed wire, and put guards there. They filmed us and demanded identification. They even searched my son's mail."

The purposes of company violence are the same now as they always have been—to break the morale of the community and begin a reign of terror that companies then blame on union members trying to hold onto their jobs.

"It's not the first time we've seen these tactics, and it won't be the last," said William Pruitt of Local Union 1803.

"We know what these companies are up to. They're out to break this union and the whole labor movement.

"One way we can fight them is to stay out of the traps they try to set for us. We've got to show violence for what it is—the company's tactics for breaking a strike."

During the course of this particular coal strike, the following is a short list of some of the examples of specific instances of management instigated violence:

March 14, 1985—A non-union coal truck slams into mine worker vehicles parked on West Virginia Route 49, destroying 10 personal vehicles.

March 15, 1985—A non-union coal truck rams into the rear of a Ford Escort driving along West Virginia Route 49, injuring four mine worker members.

May 25, 1985—Unknown attackers fired into the home of mine worker member Coty Miller while his wife and four-year old daughter are in the living room.

June 3, 1985—Nine shots are fired into the home and vehicle of Local Union President Bill Davis while his wife and three children are at home.

June 4, 1985—A non-union truck driver shoots at a group of mine worker supporters at B & G Market on Blackberry Creek in Pike County, Kentucky.

August 14, 1985—Mine Worker District 30 headquarters in Pike County, Kentucky is bombed, causing extensive structural damage.

Now, what were the State and local authorities doing during this timeframe? Was there an unwillingness or inability to act? Was there a need for yet another prosecutorial weapon from the Federal Government—a weapon which by definition could only be used to prosecute the labor side of the dispute? No. The State authorities were willing and able to investigate and prosecute violent acts by both sides of this strike:

February 18, 1985—Several hundred demonstrators are arrested at a rally protesting the company's use of strikebreakers brought in from out of state.

February 27, 1985—Truck drivers are arrested for possession of unlicensed weapons, including Uzi assault rifles.

March 15, 1985—West Virginia Secretary of State begins an investigation into the illegal activities of a Massey guard company.

March 18, 1985—Over 100 Kentucky state police dressed in full riot gear arrive to keep the peace in Pike County, Kentucky.

March 27, 1985—Mingo County Judge fines the mine workers $200,000 for violative picketing.

April 13, 1985—An undercover agent arrests a non-union coal operator for soliciting the agent to "break the arms and legs" of a mine worker member of Raleigh County, West Virginia.

May 2, 1985—Non-union truck drivers connected with the company are charged with illegal possession of deadly weapons. One of the drivers is revealed to be a convicted murderer.

August 20, 1985—West Virginia officials revoke the license of Southeastern Securities and Investigations Inc.—and ordered the withdrawal of the mercenaries from one of the processing plants.

Again, I want to emphasize that in no circumstances is violence—whether by management or labor—justified or in anyway condoned. Partially because of the violence and upheaval of labor relations in the 1930's, we passed our basic labor law in 1935. And that framework, by and large, results in the peaceful settlement of disputes through the collective bargaining process.

Over 98 percent of all contract negotiations are settled without a strike. And most strikes are peacefully conducted, with no instances of violence—by either party.

But in those rare instances where violence does accompany a strike—whether instigated by management or labor—the State and local authorities have been fully capable of discharging their duties of maintaining law and order, and restoring the peace. From a law enforcement standpoint, it makes absolutely no sense to expand Federal prosecutorial power capable of prosecuting only one side of a labor dispute—the unions.

From a union-busting perspective, this amendment makes a lot of sense. Bring in Federal law enforcement, with the threat of 20 years in jail and $10,000 in fines, and union-busting mercenaries will have a field day, intentionally destroying $2,500 worth of company property—and subjecting only the union to Federal prosecution. This would be prosecution by an administration, I might add, whose chief law enforcement officer stated last year during an interview with a national magazine that "There are no innocent suspects—if you are a suspect, you are not innocent."

I am truly amazed that the proponents of this bill are—on every other issue—the biggest proponents of State's rights and State autonomy in handling local problems, particularly in local criminal matters.

Local violence—by either management or labor—is a matter best handled—and adequately handled—by local authorities.

Even more one sided than this bill is the Wharton School of Business study on union violence: The record and the response by the courts, legislatures, and the NLRB. The statistics in the Wharton study raises some interesting points. First, let's look at the principal author. Mr. Thieblot has candidly admitted that his is not an unbiased view. In an interview in April 1975, Mr. Theiblot bluntly stated that he is promanagement. Second, let's look at the source of funding for the study. The money came exclusively from conservative, antiunion foundations, and major corporations. Are we to be surprised that such a funding source yields a study, written by a self-proclaimed promanagement author, that lays blame for strike-related violence exclusively on labors unions, exonerating the business community entirely? A study funded by an advisory group of 95 corporations can hardly be expected to be an unbiased analysis of labor-management relations.

Third, let's look at the source of the bulk of the information utilized in the study. The authors admit the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund data base is the source of most of their data.

Let's be clear about the lack of objectivity of the National Right to Work Committee, by reading an excerpt from their newsletter for this month:

The Hobbs Act amendment * * * is aimed at curbing domestic terrorism and violence orchestrated by union kingpins to bend independent minded workers to their will. Unlike other Americans, union chieftains are immune from federal prosecution * * *.

The Right to Work Committee continues their biased analysis:

This unique license to destroy the lives of innocent workers and families through beatings, bombings and shootings was granted to union officials in the Supreme Court's 5-4 ruling in United States v. Enmons in 1973. The Hobbs Act amendment would reverse this divisive decision, and close the loophole in federal law that encourages union officials to employ violence as a matter of policy to spread compulsory unionism.

The author of this study apparently not only shared in the Right to Work Committee's funding and scholarly analysis—he apparently shares their views about the source of strike-related violence.

In the course of this debate we have heard numerous instances of strike related violence—some instigated by management, some by labor, all subject to State and local prosecution. Yet Mr. Thieblot's very title of his study of strike-related violence indicates the overwhelming bias of the whole effort—it's called union violence: No mention of management violence at all. From the title, we are to believe there is only one source of violence—but that is understandable, given his funding and information sources.

The authors do acknowledge in their introduction that:

It is not our intention to lay all of the blame for labor violence at the feet of the unionists, nor to apologize for the sometimes brutal and often brutish actions of the mineowners, industrialists, sheriffs, or militiamen of previous generations. Little would be gained from such an exercise, for a complete reading of the history of the period shows that there were excesses and brutishness on both sides.

But the authors conclude:

Lacking clear evidence to the contrary, the aggressors—in the case of labor disputes, typically the unionists—must bear the greatest responsibility.

In their view, this is the assumption that guides their study: the authors assume the union is guilty—the presumption of innocence is only for those who pay wages, not for those who earn them: The authors go on to outline what in their minds, and for the purpose of the study, is the definition of violence:

Violence is the nonprivileged physical interference with the person or property of another, or the threat, express or implied, of such interference.

This definition is intended to include such physical acts as beatings or sabotage and also the objectional aspects of mass picketing such as blocking ingress or egress to a struck plant, prohibiting nonstriking or nonunion employees from exercising their right to work, and such nonphysical violence as threats, intimidation, and moral coercion. It excludes the consequences of refusals by striking employees to work or perform services, even if those services might be considered important or critical. Such actions, though they might be morally reprehensible, are not of themselves violent, in our view.

So the authors define "moral coercion" as violence. They count as an act of violence the use of moral argument, and conclude that striking "important services" is morally reprehensible. These authors have lost their own moral compass, but that often is the fate of those who sell their scholarship for silver. With these admissions, definitions, and moral judgments fresh in mind, the authors proceed to outline their goals.

They candidly admit their first goal is to, I quote: "Demonstrate the pervasiveness of labor violence and evaluate its apparently deliberate use during strikes." Note that it is not to review, study. or analyze, strike-related violence—their first goal is to prove the pervasiveness of labor violence. Given the 100 percent management funding, the Right to Work Committee information source, the admitted promanagement bias of the authors, and the stated goals of the authors at the outset of the study, we should not be surprised at the results reached, the conclusions drawn, and the recommendations made?

While admitting in their introduction that the term violence is an elusive one and is not subject to a neat definition, the authors acknowledge, and I quote: "What is meant by the term violence is complicated by the fact that perceptions of violence are colored by attitudes and conventions which are not fully definable." Yet, in the face of these ambiguities, the authors conclude that there were exactly 2,598 instances of labor violence between 1975-81. Exactly 2,598 instances of violence, not 2,597, or 2,599—but exactly 2,598. They precisely break it down by year: 1975, exactly 386; 1976, exactly 230; 1977, exactly 234; 1978, exactly 248; 1979, exactly 483; 1980, exactly 442; and 1981, exactly 575.

The authors even provide the form used for this empirical research, a form with 15 items of information to be recorded on each incident. But how did the authors ever find the time to research and compile this impressive data base? They didn't. Did a room full of poor graduate students tediously pour through thousands of police reports and investigate these thousands of violent incidents? They didn't. How did these authors come up with such an impressive and extensive data base on labor violence? Why, the Right to Work Legal Defense Fund gave it to them! That sure saved the Wharton authors a lot of research, and probably spared many graduate students thousands of hours of tedious academic investigation. But it calls into question the validity of the entire study. The empirical foundation of this is built of sand. It is composed exclusively of examples of union incidents, and the source of these incident reports are suspect, at best.

The authors describe the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation "violence data base" in the following manner:

The violence data base is a series of records of violence events involving labor union members or labor union officials. Each individual record summarizes a separate incident or a related series of incidents from information found in magazine articles, newspapers, television news program transcripts, or trade association journals.

Even the authors of the Wharton study admit to some of the problems of the Right to Work Legal Defense Fund magazine clipping data base: I quote:

One of the weaknesses of this or any catalog of violent events is the determination of what constitutes a separate event or incident. If two men on a picket line each throw a rock, one might argue with equal logic that a single violent event has occurred or that two violent events have occurred. The same problem exists with respect to one picket throwing two different rocks, or with respect to a thrown rock that both breaks a window and injures a person: How many violent events have occurred in each situation?

The counting task in the violence data base is further complicated by the fact that the information used is from secondary sources—that is, newspaper accounts and similar reports—which may not consistently decide these questions, and which may describe the same activity from different perspectives using different words, or may describe it on different days.

One brick thrown twice? How many times is that to be counted? I don't mean to trivialize the seriousness of strike-related violence, because in the rare instance that it does occur, it is a serious matter, to be seriously dealt with. But it should be dealt with by the State and local authorities who are there, best equipped to handle and prosecute the perpetrators. I do mean to trivalize this Wharton study. The authors take conservative foundation and corporate money, conduct a study based almost entirely on magazine clippings and expect us to rely on their figures and conclusions to greatly expand the Federal prosecution of unions by expanding the definition of extortion to include labor violence—but not touching management violence.

The Wharton study takes no account of management violence in "empirical analysis" and I use the term empirical very loosely, the methodology much more closely resembling ancedotal manipulation—and takes into account each brick thrown in each strike, while admitting to significant overcounting of these incidents.

The Wharton study in and of itself does violence—violence to the integrity of academic research, violence to the notions of academic objectivity and fairness, and violence to the concepts of unbiased, fair research by our institutions of higher education.

The Hobbs Act was designed simply to prevent both union members and nonunion people from making use of robbery and extortion under the guise of obtaining wages in the obstruction of interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act is not intended to reach violence during a strike to achieve legitimate collective-bargaining objectives. From the time of the act's passage in 1946, the courts of this country have consistently recognized this intent and have held as such.

Proponents of the Hobbs Act defended it as not encroaching on the legitimate activities of labor unions on the grounds that the act incorporated New York's definition of extortion, that is "the obtaining of property from another * * * with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right." Construing this language back in 1960, the New York Court of Appeals held that when the object of a lawful activity is the personal enrichment of the actor rather than the economic betterment of the worker, it is extortion. On the other hand, where the end is attainment of a legitimate labor objective, there is no extortion because there is no intent to misappropriate property. (People v. Dioguardi, 8 N.Y. 2d 260, 168 N.E. 2d 683, 203 N.Y. 2d 870 (1960).) This principle has been followed by many of the circuit courts. In United States v. Kramer, 355 F. 2d 891 (7th Cir. 1966), the seventh circuit found a Hobbs Act violation where a union leader threatened an employee with labor trouble if he was not paid a sum of money. Likewise, in United States v. Kemble, 198 F. 2d 899 (3rd Cir. 1952) the third circuit found a Hobbs Act violation when a union business representative forcibly insisted that a nonunion truckdriver employ a helper referred by his Local to unload the trucks because of the truckdriver's nonunion status. The list goes on. In 1956 the Supreme Court held that union representatives violated the Hobbs Act as the extortionate acts consisted of attempts to obtain from an employer "his money, in the form of wages to be paid for imposed, unwanted, superfluous and fictitious services of laborers commonly known as swampers induced by threats of force or violence." United States v. Green, 350 U.S. 415 (1956).

The fifth circuit has followed these cases in its interpretation of the Hobbs Act. In United States v. Quinn 514 F. 2d 1250 (5th Cir. 1975) the Court upheld the Hobbs Act conviction of an individual who had received a payoff from an employer in return for calling off a picket line at the employer's premises. Even though there was no threat of violence, the lack of a legitimate labor objective made this threat of economic harm a Hobbs Act violation.

My colleagues should also note that the Hobbs Act in its current state is highly effective in reaching a wide range of conduct that falls short of violence. In United States v. Nell, 570 F. 2d 1257 (5th Cir. 1978), for example, the defendant had received money from three contractors after their cranes and heavy equipment had been vandalized and destroyed. The Court ruled that guilt did not depend on whether the defendant was in fact responsible for the damage to the equipment. In order to convict under the Hobbs Act, the government need only show that the person receiving the money had no lawful claim to it and the person doing business in interstate commerce made the payment out of fear. The contractors had testified that they made the payments because of the defendant's reputation, but they could not specifically link him to the equipment damage. One contractor testified that he feared the defendant economically, but not physically. Similarly, the 11th circuit in United States v. Kopituk, 690 F. 2d 1289 (11th Cir. 1982), found that the defendants obtained money and other articles of value—cruise tickets—from the employer through extortionate means. There was, in fact, an implicit threat of economic injury underlying the entire conspiracy. The employer's weekly "peace payments" were for the purpose of ensuring continued labor peace.

Two years ago, the first circuit upheld a Hobbs Act conviction of a union local's business manager who extorted a co-owner of a Massachusetts roofing company for using nonunion labor. More specifically, the court said:

> Guilderson (the co-owner) understood Gibson's offer to solve his company's "problem" for a consideration as a threat of violence to himself and to company property . . . we think . . . that Gibson's use of the word "problem" plus his demand for a payoff to solve the problem was deliberately calculated to raise the specter of violence. United States v. Gibson, 726 F. 2d 869, 872 (1st Cir. 1984), Cert. denied, 104 S. Ct. 2174.

And in 1983, the eight circuit in United States v. Wilford affirmed a jury finding that union officials were guilty of demanding and accepting an unloading fee in violation of the Hobbs Act.

This case-law confirms my strong belief that the Hobbs Act in its current state serves the purpose intended by Congress. The act reaches extortionate labor conduct. It does not and should not reach incidental violence committed during a lawful strike or other lawful conduct in pursuit of their statutory right to reach agreement on legitimate collective-bargaining demands.

The bill's proponents have suggested that the bill applies to management violence, too. That claim is absurd. What we are dealing with is a very narrow, very specific, very serious crime—extortion. Extortion has been defined within the current Hobbs Act as: "The obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear, or under color of official right." S. 1774 would expand that definition to: "The obtaining of property from another, with his or her consent, induced by case of actual or threatened force, violence or fear thereof, or wrongful use of fear not involving force or violence, or under color of official right."

As interpreted by the Supreme Court, the use of the word "wrongful" means that the extortionist must seek to obtain property to which he has no legal right.

What property does an employer seek to obtain when he hires agents to beat up strikers? None! What property is at stake?

WAGES

Whose wages are they? The employer's. How could an employer ever be prosecuted for wrongfully obtaining property already his? He could not.

But under this expanded definition of extortion, which includes even fear not involving force or violence, unions and their members would be subject to Hobbs Act prosecution. Even when no force or violence was involved, if the employer has fear of economic harm flowing from the strike—even when there are legitimate labor objectives pursued by the statutorily protected right to engage in a strike. Twenty years in jail, if an employer alleges the union threatened adverse economic consequences would result if a strike occurred. If the employer alleges he was afraid of the economic harm—and every strike involves obvious economic harm to both sides—the union may be brought up on Hobbs Act charges, and face 20 years in jail.

Current case law has upheld that the threat of economic harm, without violence, may constitute extortion under the Hobbs Act—where there is no legitimate labor objective. United States v. Arambosich 597 F. 2d 609 (7th Cir. 1979)

S. 1774 removes that qualification.

The word "property" in the Hobbs Act probably does not extend to statutory or contractual rights of employees under Federal labor law.

As S. 1774 defines extortion as the obtaining of property from another, with his or her consent, induced by use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear there of, or wrongful use of fear not involving force or violence, or under color of official right.

During the past two decades, the courts in this country have occasionally construed the word "property" in the Hobbs Act to include intangible property rights or any valuable right considered as a source or element of wealth. None of these cases involved legitimate labor disputes.

In United States v. Tropiano, 418 F. 2d 1069 (2d Cir. 1969), several rubbish collectors used threats of violence to induce a rival collector to abandon customers and to refrain from soliciting additional customers. The defendants challenged their convictions on the ground that the prosecution's evidence indicated that no property had been extorted, asserting that nothing more than the right to do business had been surrendered by the victim, and that such a right was not property obtained by the defendants, as those terms are used in the Hobbs Act. While conceding that actual rubbish removal accounts, which may be purchased and sold, were probably property, the defendants argued that the right to solicit business was amorphous and could not be squared with the congressional expression in the act of obtaining property.

The Court responded that the Hobbs Act "speaks in broad language, manifesting a purpose to use all the constitutional power Congress had to punish interference with interstate commerce by extortion, robbery or physical violence." 418 F. 2d 1075, quoting Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212, 215 (1960). The Court found that the concept of property under the Hobbs Act, as devolved from its legislative history and numerous decisions, was not limited to physical or tangible property or things, but included, in a broad sense, any valuable right considered as a source or element of wealth, and did not depend upon a direct benefit being conferred on the person who obtained the property. The Court found that the victim had an obvious right to solicit business from anyone in any area without any territorial restrictions by the defendants, and that only by exercise of such a right could customers be obtained whose accounts were admittedly valuable. The courts thus ruled that the right to pursue a lawful business, including the solicitation of customers necessary to the conduct of such business, has long been recognized as a property right within the protection of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution, and that the victim's right to solicit accounts constituted property within the Hobbs Act definition.

In United States v. Zemek, 634 F. 2d 1159 (9th Cir. 1980), the defendants were convicted of extortion to obtain the good-will and customer revenue of a competing tavern by forceful acts, including damage to the tavern with a molotov cocktail, destroying the tavern by fire, tailing the owners, breaking into the owners' home and threatening the occupants, and plotting to blow up the tavern. The Court held that the concept of property under the Hobbs Act is not limited to physical or tangible things, and that the right to make business decisions free from wrongful coercion is a protected property right. The Court sustained a jury instruction by the trial court that property includes "any valuable right considered as a source of element of wealth." 634 F. 2d at 1147, quoting United States v. Tropiano, supra, 418 F. 2d at 1075. The Court concluded that tavern owner's right to solicit business free from threatened destruction and physical harm falls within the scope of protected property rights under the Hobbs Act. (Idem). Another court held that extortion under the Hobbs Act does not require a direct benefit to the extortionist, that the gravamen of the offense is loss to the victim, and that such loss includes intangible as well as tangible property. United States v. Santoni, 585 F. 2d 667, 673 (4th Cir. 1978) property extorted was the right of victim to make a business decision free from outside pressure wrongfully imposed. Similarly, the Court in United States v. Nadaline, 471 F. 2d 340 (5th Cir. 1973) held that intangible property, such as business accounts and unrealized profits from those accounts, is included within those rights protected by the extortion provisions of the Hobbs Act, 471 F. 2d at 344.

Despite this case law, no court has ever held that the intangible concept of property extends to statutory or contractual rights of employees under Federal labor law. I believe the intent of this bill is not to extend to such intangible property rights, and employers could not be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act for wrongfully denying those rights—even if it is by use of extreme violence.

It is also claimed that the amendment exempts minor acts of violence and minor property damage.

Let's take a look at the "bar to prosecution" within S. 1774. Section (d) provides:

(d) it is a bar to a prosecution under this section that the conduct of the defendant—

(1) was incidental to peaceful picketing in the course of a legitimate labor dispute, as defined in Section 2(9) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U.S.C. 152(9));

(2) consisted solely of minor bodily injury, or minor damage to property not exceeding a value of $2,500, or a threat of such minor injury or damage; and

(3) was not intended to obtain property.

So a prosecution can't be brought under the Hobbs Act if three conditions are all met:

First, if it is incidental to peaceful picketing in the course of a legitimate labor dispute.

Second, it also must consist solely of minor bodily injury, or minor damage to property not exceeding $2,500, or a threat of minor injury or damage.

And most important, the third requirement to be met before Hobbs Act prosecution would be barred the harm or threat must not have been intended to obtain property.

There's the clincher! Do you know of any strike which was not intended to obtain property, in the form of wages?

What section (d) is saying is that minor incidents will be exempt from Hobbs Act prosecution—unless done by workers in the course of a strike to obtain wages!

The bar to prosecution in reality is no bar at all.

Proponents also allege that this bill is supported by the Justice Department, and that these changes were recommended by the Commission on Organized Crime.

Frankly, the Justice Department's position on amending the Hobbs Act seems to swing with the right-wing winds. Let me give you some excerpts from the testimony of the Reagan administration Justice Department on almost identical legislation.

On December 10, before the Judiciary Subcommittee on criminal law, Assistant Attorney General Jonathan Rose made the following statement:

Incidents of violence occurring during labor disputes are today prosecuted by state and local authorities, and we believe those incidents should in the future continue to be prosecuted.

The Justice Department believes that these provisions would result in an extremely broad expansion of federal criminal enforcement responsibilities, which is not justified and which could severely tax the resources of the department.

The Federal Government could be called upon to prosecute such crimes which are now more appropriately handled by local authorities.

First, the Department has neither the investigative nor prosecutorial manpower to pursue every alleged violation which could arise under the statutory language.

Second, although we do not question the authority of Congress to create such crimes under its power to regulate commerce, there are delicate questions of federalism involved here so that Federal investigation and prosecution of every alleged violation would not be appropriate.

Third, enactment of these new crimes is not necessary to remedy the specific kinds of problems raised by the Enmons decision.

Mr. Rose went on to state:

Here you simply would be holding out the promise of federal enforcement where we believe it is not realistic or appropriate. We simply are not in the foreseeable future going to have the resources to handle this kind of vastly increased jurisdiction and we do not think it necessary because we do believe the States and localities have been handling the matters effectively.

Mr. Rose concluded:

As a general matter, we simply have not found it a matter, with regard to violence alone in labor disputes that there ought to be a general federal jurisdiction to deal with that issue. We simply have not found the reluctance, if it exists at all, to reach any such extent that the kind of expansion of jurisdiction in this bill that would be provided is necessary or justified.

Now, we are told the Justice Department has changed its mind, and supports this amendment expanding Federal authority into the most traditional of all local matters—keeping the peace.

Let me last address the proponent's claim that labor violence escapes punishment. Flaring tempers by labor and management may sometimes lead to bodily harm or property damage. But it should not be the job of the Hobbs Act to prosecute those individuals who cause such damage. It is the job of the States to keep the peace—and they are doing it—pursuant to their police power. Since the passage of the Wagner Act in 1935, the States have retained and exercised effectively their authority to enjoin violent labor activity pursuant to their police power.

It is highly hypocritical that the proponents of S. 1774, who allegedly seek to carry out the current administration's New Federalism by returning power from the Federal Government to the States, are now standing behind a measure that will undermine State power.

This measure is unnecessary, because the States have the authority to prosecute perpetrators of violent labor activity, and because there are other Federal statutes that address the problem of labor-management violence without chilling the rights that employees are guaranteed by the National Labor Relations Act.

In 1981, the ninth circuit, in United States v. Thordarson, 646, F. 2d 1322 (9th Cir. 1981), held that the doctrine of the Enmons case applies only to prosecutions under the Hobbs Act.

In Thordarson, the defendants were charged with the use of explosives to damage vehicles used in interstate commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. sec. 844(i); travel in interstate commerce to commit arson, in violation of the Travel Act, 18 U.S.C. 1952; and conspiracy of conduct the affairs of an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, in Violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization [RICO] Act, 18 U.S.C. 1962(d).

All these prosecutions can be pursued when violence is used in labor situations. In 1947 Congress passed the Labor-Management Relations Act, which made it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to cause or attempt to cause an employer to pay or deliver or agree to pay or deliver any money or other things of value, the nature of an exaction, for services which are not peformed or not to be performed." Labor-Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. 158(b)(6) (1947). The meaning of this language is clear and unambiguous. Congress intended to make demands for unwanted services and unfair labor practice. Case law, State authority to prosecute perpetrators of labor-management violence, other criminal Federal statutes like the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Oganization [RICO] Act and the National Labor Relations Act itself all give great weight to the conclusion that S. 1774, is an unnecessary, antilabor prosecutorial excess.

We are also told the Commission on Organized Crime supports these proposed changes.

But that support is pulled completely out of context in the Commission's report. The Commission made a package recommendation for a comprehensive approach to organized crime, an entire restructuring of our national approach. As to specific statutory recommendations, the Commission cautioned:

Their true value lies in their use as part of the overall national strategy or plan.

To snatch one specific out of the package proposal distorts the intentions and findings of the Commission.

Furthermore, the example used by the Commission as a reason why the law should be changed already is prosecutable under the Hobbs Act! Use of violence to eliminate a business competitor is a violation under current law. There are labor officials in jail for violating the Hobbs Act, for using force for wrongful purposes. They all probably alleged legitimate union activities—but prosecutors easily rebut this allegation where union aims are not legitimate

Finally, the specific language recommended by the Commission is significantly different from that which is before us now. To take the findings of the Commission, pull them out of context, and try to make that an endorsement for specific legislation which materially differs from the language they put forward is very misleading.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today in opposition to S. 1774, a bill to amend the Hobbs Act to make labor union violence a Federal crime. And, I have voted against ending debate on the motion to proceed to consideration of this measure.

First, S. 1777 would unnecessarily expand Federal jurisdiction into an area which has traditionally been effectively covered by State and local law. Supporters argue that State and local law enforcement officials may be unwilling or unable to arrest and prosecute union members accused of illegal acts. They claim that if union violence were made a Federal crime, Federal law enforcement officials would prosecute without hesitation or fear. Mr. President, I have not seen sufficient evidence to support this argument.

In my home State of Minnesota, one finds an excellent example of a situation where Federal law would only intrude upon State and local governance. I am certain that many of my colleagues have seen media accounts of the prolonged labor dispute taking place at the George A. Hormel packinghouse in Austin. In the past, violence has erupted on the picket line; however, the Governor of Minnesota has taken steps to control that violence. Furthermore, the State and local law enforcement officials have prosecuted and jailed numerous union members convicted of committing crimes. These officials are fulfilling their law enforcement responsibilities. Why should the Federal Government intervene?

Second, the State of Minnesota has sufficient procedures to ensure that justice is carried out in cases where a local prosecutor does not wish to try a case against his own citizens. If such a situation were to arise, the Governor could request that the State attorney general take over the case.

Third, I do not believe that the Federal Government should be in the business of policing picket lines. This is an inefficient use of our resources at a time when budgetary pressures are forcing deep spending cuts in all Federal programs.

Finally, the intervention of the Federal Government into union protests can greatly interfere with the collective bargaining process, thus slowing rather than speeding up a resolution to the strike.

My vote against S. 1774 does not mean I condone labor union violence. To the contrary, I firmly believe that anyone who commits a crime, regardless of affiliations or motivation, should be properly prosecuted and punished. However, in this situation, I do not think that Federal law would be more effective than State or local law at eliminating or deterring labor union crimes. In fact, it could be detrimental to the resolution of labor disputes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

Mr. President, today was a major moment in the history of the effort to repeal the Hobbs Act. Just repealing the Hobbs Act is probably not exactly the right phraseology, but actually to reverse the exemption which is provided in the Hobbs Act. It is a major day because, in an effort to move forward in connection with the bill, I myself confess that I would have thought there would be more votes than there were.

But I think that the fact that there were only 44 votes in the affirmative indicates that the Senate has a concern both about the substance of the bill as well as the manner in which it was called up.

The manner in which it was called up is shocking. I was on the floor the other day when somebody talked about prerogatives of the leadership, which I would always be prepared to respect. But there are also prerogatives of the U.S. Senate. I also respect those.

This bill was voted on in committee and the committee failed to report it out. Yet the sponsor of the bill put it on the calendar and the majority leader called it up.

That totally undercuts the committee system. I think when it does, it certainly creates problems for the body and we all have to question the use of that procedure.

As a matter of fact, I am told that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who is unable to move forward in connection with another bill, is following a similar procedure in order to try to get that measure to the calendar.

Why should the Senate spend time on a bill that has already been defeated in committee? Would anybody suggest that this is a matter of national importance compared to other issues we need to debate such as the budget, tax reform? Those are the issues that ought to be on the floor of the U.S. Senate, not the Hobbs Act.

This is not the first example of ignoring the committee system during this Congress. One of the worst bills this Senate has acted upon, the McClure-Volkmer bill gutting our country's gun control laws, was put on the calendar without going through committee. The budget resolution, which went through the committee, and which, under the law, was to be on the calendar and disposed of as of yesterday, has not as yet been put on the calendar. We proceed backward. We travel in reverse.

What about the bill itself? This bill will not do anything about stopping violence. This is just a fun-and-games bill for some to try to force through and claim that they are prepared to provide some protection against violence.

First of all, I have been in tune with what has been happening in labor matters over the course of many years. Certainly, there have been times when there have been confrontations on the picket lines, as happened in the Hormel strike. But this bill is not going to stop violence if it were to pass. It will not do anything about strengthening law enforcement. This bill is packaging. It is packaging only. It sounds good, but it does nothing.

The kind of conduct the proponents of this bill say they want to stop is already illegal under State law. If a worker in a picket line shoots out a window during a strike, that is a crime under State law. Since when do we need the Federal Government to prosecute shooting out windows?

If there is a fistfight that breaks out during a strike, that may or may not be a crime under State law. But if it is a crime at all, then it is a crime under State law. If there is any type of violence during a strike that rises to the level of criminal conduct, the local law enforcement officials can already prosecute, under the law.

The supporters of this bill are quick to support States rights, and that is a subject I would like to talk about for a moment.

Every single one of those who voted to invoke cloture and who are supporters of this bill—every single one of them—is in that crowd in the Senate that bleats as loudly and as clearly as they possibly can, claiming States rights, "the Federal Government ought to get out of the State's business."

But when it comes to the State, this bill, the Hobbs Act, then they say, "No, no, we need the Federal Government to get in. We ought to make it a Federal crime to have violence on the picket line." They want to turn things back over to State and local governments.

I think that somewhat indicates the absurdity and ridiculousness of this position taken by those who are promoting this bill.

They believe that the State ought to have more responsibility in all other areas, so why not with respect to violence on the picket line? But here they want to throw the book at them under Federal law.

The fact is that the dispute over the Hobbs Act application to labor violence is a tempest in a teapot. There is no general exemption for labor unions under the Federal extortion criminal statute. Labor unions can be prosecuted just like anyone else.

The whole debate about the Hobbs Act arises because the statute only covers attempts to obtain property to which the defendant has no lawful claim. The Supreme Court held 13 years ago in the Enmons decision that the Government could not expand the meaning of the statute to cover cases where the defendant had a lawful claim to the property.

The Court said:

> The Government's broad concept of extortion—the "wrongful" use of force to obtain even the legitimate union demands of higher wages—is not easily restricted. It would cover all overtly coercive economic conduct in the course of an economic strike, obstructing, delaying or affecting commerce. The worker who threw a punch on a picket line, or the striker who deflated the tires of his employer's truck would be subject to a Hobbs Act prosecution and the possibility of 20 years' imprisonment and a $10,000 fine.

In other words, the Hobbs Act could not be used to bootstrap the jurisdiction of the Federal criminal law to ordinary assault or vandalism just because it took place in the context of a strike and the strike affected interstate commerce.

Yet we have the proponents of this bill anxious to expand the long arm of the Federal law.

The bill says it is not intended to chill legitimate labor activity and that Federal prosecution is not authorized for minor bodily injury or minor damage to property. But—and it is a big but—there is a qualification. It does not cover minor injury or damage only if it is not intended to obtain property. But the Hobbs Act itself requires an intent to obtain property. So this exemption means nothing. If an act of violence is not intended to obtain property it is not covered anyway.

And that language raises another problem. What are "minor bodily injury" and "minor damage to property"? These are vague terms to set a standard for a criminal violation. And if it turns out that the court decides someone has violated the law, he or she is subject to a $10,000 fine and imprisonment up to 20 years.

Much is made of the fact that this bill is going to stop labor unions from using violence to force payoffs of ghost employees or to obtain bribes. The truth is that the Hobbs Act already prohibits that kind of activity under Federal law.

Here is what the Supreme Court said in the Enmons opinion:

> . . . the Hobbs Act has properly been held to reach instances where union officials threatened force or violence against an employer in order to obtain personal payoffs, and where unions used the proscribed means to exact "wage" payments from employers in return for imposed, unwanted, superfluous and fictitious services of workers.

Another phony argument is made in support of this bill. The proponents say that the bill is necessary to stop organized crime activities. The President's Commission on Organized Crime identified the Hobbs Act as a problem in depriving Federal prosecutors of a tool to use against an organized crime-infiltrated labor union.

The hypothetical example cited by the Commission is an organized-crime dominated labor union which engages in violence in order to eliminate an unwanted business competitor. However, the Hobbs Act would not preclude prosecution of the union in this case because destroying a competitor is not a legitimate union activity.

The fact is that any type of labor union activity which is really the result of domination by organized crime is not going to be in pursuit of a lawful objective. Consequently, this kind of activity may still be prosecuted under the current law.

Another point the Commission overlooks is that other Federal statutes allow prosecution of labor unions if they become involved with organized crime. The RICO statute, prohibiting a pattern of racketeering, allows prosecutions of labor unions and others if they have engaged in two or more instances of criminal conduct in pursuit of a pattern of racketeering. This statute was passed expressly for the purpose of stopping organized crime and organizations involved with organized crime. There is no exemption for labor unions.

The proponents of this bill would have you believe that there is a cry coming from State and local police officials for Federal help. This just is not so. That is not factual. Listen to 1,000 enforcement officials in 500 of this country's largest cities. When asked about strike-related violence in their communities, 96 percent of those surveyed found it to be "not very serious" or "not at all serious."

These same 1,000 officials were asked what enforcement programs they would spend money on if it was readily available and abundant. Not even 1 percent said they would like to use this money toward aiding local police in combating strike-related violence. Other programs needed money more they said.

The fact is that this bill has nothing to do with organized crime. It has nothing to do with bribes and payoffs. It is simply a way to extend Federal jurisdiction into local affairs. It is a way to allow the FBI and U.S. attorneys to get involved in labor-management relations at the local level. Let's face it. It's a way to give some overly aggressive U.S. attorney a tool for breaking a strike.

Let us face it: If the FBI and all the U.S. attorneys did all that they should be doing now with respect to crime and drugs and some other areas of a similar nature, the country would be better served. I think we can hardly afford to use their time in broadening their jurisdiction in the manner suggested by this legislation.

Nobody in the United States is going to be safer if this bill is passed. Nobody is going to be protected who is not protected now. This is not a law enforcement bill. This is an antiworker bill. I oppose it.

The Senate has acted wisely in refusing to invoke cloture with respect to the motion to proceed.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I regret the action of the Senate in failing to invoke cloture on the motion to proceed to S. 1774, the Hobbs Act bill. I would have hoped, at the very least, that the Senate could have an opportunity to consider the bill on its merits, vote on amendments, and, finally, work its will on the bill, without being sidetracked on a procedural point.

The Enmons decision represented what, I believe, is a perversion of the intent of Congress when it enacted the Hobbs Act. By a narrow 5 to 4 margin, the Supreme Court made the unfortunate move of completely exempting one area—and only one area—from Federal law governing extortionate activity. I do not believe that is good law or good jurisprudence. Associate Justice Douglas, on behalf of himself, the Chief Justice, and Justices Powell and Rehnquist, summarized the issue when he stated:

The Court today achieves by interpretation what those who were opposed to the Hobbs Act were unable to get Congress to do.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the dissenting opinion by Justice Douglas be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Justice Douglas, with whom the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Rehnquist concur, dissenting.

The Court today achieves by interpretation what those who were opposed to the Hobbs Act were unable to get Congress to do. The Court considers primarily the legislative history of a predecessor bill considered by the 78th Congress. The bill before us was considered and enacted by the 79th Congress; and, as I read the debates, the opposition lost in the 79th Congress what they win today. All of which makes pertinent Mr. Justice Holmes' admonition in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 270, 24 S.Ct. 638, 639, 48 L.Ed. 971, that "it must be remembered that legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts."

In United States v. Local 807, 315 U.S. 521, 62 S.Ct. 642, 86 L.Ed. 1004, we had before us the Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 979, which made it a crime to use violence respecting interstate trade or commerce to obtain the "payment of money or other valuable considerations," excluding "the payment of wages by a bona-fide employer to a bona-fide employee." We held that the exception included demands for unwanted or superfluous services and covered those who wanted jobs, not only those who presently had them.

Congress in the Hobbs Act changed the law. The critical change was the exclusion of the employer-employee clause. The Court said in the United States v. Green, 350 U.S. 415, 419, 76 S.Ct. 522, 525, 100 L.Ed. 494: "In the Hobbs Act, 60 Stat. 420, carried forward as 18 U.S.C. § 1951, which amended the Anti-Racketeering Act, the exclusion clause involved in the Local 807 decision was dropped. The legislative history makes clear that the new Act was meant to eliminate any grounds for future judicial conclusions that Congress did not intend to cover the employer-employee relationship. The words were defined to avoid any misunderstanding."

In Green, the Court held that it was an extortion within the meaning of the Act to use force to obtain payment of wages for unwanted and superfluous services. Id., at 417, 76 S.Ct., at 524.

Here, the services were not unwanted or superfluous; they were services being negotiated under a collective-bargaining agreement.

The Court relies mostly on the legislative history of a measure covering the same topic which was passed by the previous House but on which the Senate did not act. Two years later, the bill in its present form was enacted. It was a differently constituted House that debated it and the year was 1945 rather than 1943. So the most relevant legislative history, in my view, concerns the 79th Congress, not the 78th.

The fear was expressed in the House that the elimination of the Exception Clause would open up the prospect of labor's being prosecuted.[1] As a consequence, Congressman Celler sought to amend the measure so as to exempt the use of violence to exact "wages paid by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee." [2] His precise amendment in that regard would define "property" in the Act as not including "wages paid by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee."[3] Those who objected said that it would substantially restore the 1934 Act.[4]

Congressman Biemiller, in speaking for the Celler Amendment said:

"We fear, for example, under the bill as it now stands, that a simple, unfortunate altercation on a picket line—and we all know that human beings are frail and when tempers are hot some trouble may develop—under such a situation you may send a man to jail for 20 years or fine him $10,000." [5]

The Celler amendment was rejected.[6]

As I read the Congressional Record, Congressman Baldwin spoke for the concensus when he said:

"This bill would not have been presented to the House if organized labor had recognized law and order in striking and in establishing their rights, as they have a right to do. Everyone can remember the taxicab strike in the city of Baltimore, which does not pertain to this bill, where cabs were overturned, bricks thrown through the windows endangering the lives of people, innocent victims. Those were the tactics of organized labor which you people support outright and which organized labor sanctioned. The leaders were locked up and put in jail for participating in those activities. Yet you stand here on the floor of this House and say they did not do it or they did not know anything about it.

"Mr. Chairman, labor has a right to strike, but when labor perpetrates that sort of thing, they are going far beyond the bounds of reason. Certainly, I do not take the position that labor has not the right to organize or to strike, but when they do so they should abide by the laws of the land and the laws of decency. If they had done that, we would not have this legislation before the House today." [7]

Congressman Whittington voiced the same sentiments:

"The pending bill will provide for punishing racketeers who rob or extort. There is no justification for labor unions opposing the bill as it constitutes no invasion of the legitimate rights of labor. Robbery and extortion by members of labor unions must be punished. Labor unions owe that much to the public. In demanding the protection of laws, labor unions should urge that those engaged in legitimate interstate commerce be protected from robbery and extortion." [8]

Congressman Celler offered another amendment which would give as a defense to a charge under the Hobbs Act that the employee "did not violate the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the Clayton Act, or the Railway Labor Act, or the National Labor Relations Act." [9] But that amendment was also voted down; [10] the only provision of the Hobbs Act which touched on that problem was 18 U.S.C. § 1951(c), which stated that this section "shall not be construed to repeal, modify or affect" those laws. References were made in the House debates to the trucking problem in New York, where farmers bringing their produce to market in trucks were held up and money was extorted "from the drivers in order that the shipments might enter the Holland Tunnel and be delivered to their respective destinations in New York." [11]

Congressman LaFollette offered an amendment which would keep the 1934 Act intact but would bar the use of violence by a person not a bona fide employee to obtain property from a bona fide employer.[12] That, too, was defeated.[13]

In the present case, violence was used during the bargaining—five acts of violence involving the shooting and sabotage of the employer's transformers and the blowing up of a company transformer substation. The violence was used to obtain higher wages and other benefits for union members. The acts literally fit the definition of extortion used in the Hobbs Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1951. The term "extortion" means the use of violence to obtain "property" from another § 1951(b)(2). The crime is the use of "extortion" in furtherance of a plan to do anything in violation of the section. § 1951(a). The prior exception covering those who seek "the payment of wages by a bona-fide employer to a bona-fide employee" was taken out of the Act by Congress. Hence, the use of violence to obtain higher wages is plainly a method of obtaining "property from another" within the meaning of § 1951(b)(2).

Seeking higher wages is certainly not unlawful. But using violence to obtain them seems plainly within the scope of "extortion" as used in the Act, just as is the use of violence to exact payment for no work or the use of violence to get a sham substitution for no work. The regime of violence, whatever its precise objective, is a common device of extortion and is condemned by the Act.

Congressman Lemke said in the House debates on the Hobbs Act which he opposed, "The minority is generally right." [14]

Whatever may be thought of the policy which the Court today embroiders into the Act, it was the minority view in the House and clearly did not represent the consensus of the House. No light is thrown on the matter by the Senate, for it summarily approved the House version of the bill.[15]

It is easy in these insulated chambers to put an attractive gloss on an Act of Congress if five votes can be obtained. At times, the legislative history of a measure is so clouded or obscure that we must perforce give some meaning to vague words.[16] But where, as here, the consensus of the House is so clear, we should carry out its purpose no matter how distasteful or undesirable that policy may be to us,[17] unless of course the Act oversteps constitutional boundaries. But none has been so hardy as even to suggest that.

While we said in Kirschbaum C. v. Walling, 316 U.S. 517, 522, 62 S.Ct. 1116, 1119, 86 L.Ed. 1638, that it is "retrospective expansion of meaning which properly deserves the stigma of judicial legislation," the same is true of retrospective contraction of meaning.

I would reverse.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, numerous congressional investigations and "think tank" studies have been undertaken with respect to the Enmons case. Although, as the vote suggests, there is strong disagreement on the policy surrounding the Enmons case, I think the better view is that Enmons thwarted the congressional intent in enacting the Hobbs Act, and did so in a way that laid the groundwork for bizarre and unjust results. The House Republican Study Committee, in its 1984 hearings on the subject, heard from a New Jersey janitor who had his house vandalized and was threatened with a knife pursuant to labor-union-related violence, a Philadelphia contractor who was hospitalized for spinal surgery during a labor dispute, and a construction business owner who had to be placed in the witness protection program as a result of union violence. These cases should be subject to Federal purview and prosecution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the House Republican Study Committee be printed in the RECORD at this point:

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT ON RSC HEARINGS ON LABOR VIOLENCE

On February 8, 1984, the RSC held hearings on the subject of labor violence. These hearings stemmed from continuing frustration on the part of conservatives in the House: the widespread nature of this type of violence has not been adequately aired, and legislation to discourage this violence has been stalled by the Democratic leadership.

The Focus: The hearings focused on an injustice in current federal law. The Hobbs Act addresses the crime of extortion, described as the taking of property from another by using force or violence to obtain another's consent. However, in a 1973 Supreme Court decision known as the Enmons decision, this law was held not to apply where the extortion had a legitimate labor objective as a goal. Thus, although the rest of us could be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act for extortion as described above, a special exemption for labor is allowed for example when this tactic is used in a press for higher wages or benefits.

[17] The fear was expreseed in the House debates by opponents of the measure that a fistfight on a picket line during a strike could bring down on the offender a $10,000 fine and 20 years in jail or both. See 91 Cong. Rec. 11916; supra, at 1017. And the Government actually argued in one case, United States v. Caldes, 9 Cir., 457 F.2d 74, 78, that a union and its members were guilty of extortion if they used the coercion of a strike to obtain economic benefits from the employer. That, however, is nonsense, as these court in Caldes ruled, id., at 79, for the Hobbs Act specifically does not touch collective bargaining of which the strike is a component part. 18 U.S.C. § 1951(c). Moreover, the court in Caldes held that "mischievous" conduct during a strike and actions which are "the by-product of frustration engendered by a prolonged, bona fide collective bargaining negotiation," id., at 78, are often only low-level acts of violence that may be unfair labor practices or at best, subject to state, not federal, prosecution. That is my view.

Corrective legislation: There are two bills in the House and one in the Senate amending the Hobbs Act in a way that would restore equity, making sure that labor violence is treated no differently than any other violence falling within the federal realm. These bills eliminate the special exemption now enjoyed by labor, clarifying Congressional intent so that the law cannot be again misinterpreted by the courts.

H.R. 287 (J. Kenneth Robinson) and H.R. 1514 (P.M. Crane) are pending in the Judiciary Committee, Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, with no action pending.

S. 462 (Grassley) had hearings last October in the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers in the Judiciary Committee, and full Committee hearings are expected in mid-March.

WITNESSES

Four witnesses testified at these hearings, appearing before the committee despite some personal risk. All had already suffered greatly—from destruction of property, from intimidation and threats, from physical violence, and from the emotional effects of such lawlessness.

To further point up the magnitude of the problem of unchecked labor violence, we note that three of the seven witnesses originally invited to testify later declined to appear before our committee because they said they had received further threats of violence and were afraid to appear, or they were fearful of further violent acts if they dared to testify at the hearing.

FEDERAL LAW NEEDED

There are numerous factors which make local or state prosecution and conviction of labor violence less than certain. Individual states are limited in effectively dealing with labor violence affecting interstate commerce. Indeed, in some cases labor tacticians from out of state are sent into a locality expressely to plan or manage a local or statewide strike.

Labor violence can exert tremendous pressure on authorities and institutions of a community which in some cases are clearly beyond its resources to contain equitably.

Local and state public officials are sometimes hesitant to pursue a case of labor violence because of the labor union's political or financial clout. Law enforcement agencies have been known to decline to step in because they themselves are unionized and are therefore reluctant to interfer with the union responsible for the violence.

It cannot be assumed that individuals willing to bomb, sabotage equipment, destroy private property, and physically assault another would not also continue this behavior to exert further pressure in order to avoid prosecution and conviction by local or state authorities. Prosecution under such circumstances can sometimes be understandably lax. Further, in cases of strikes by public officials (police or firemen, for example) there may be no local law enforcement or government to speak of.

Further, for fifty years labor management relations have been widely presumed to affect interstate commerce. The national organization structure of most unions, with jurisdiction that covers many states, supports this view, and violence of the unions certainly impact collective bargaining and in turn, interstate commerce.

It clearly is an area of legitimate Federal jurisdiction, because these unions do cross State borders, and normally, I would harbor a great respect for local law enforcement, but you are dealing with entities here that are not just national—they are international, and as a result, that is a legitimate basis for getting the national law enforcement authorities to go to work in your behalf, especially in areas where local law enforcement authorities have broken down. (Rep. Philip Crane, RSC hearings on labor violence, 2/8/84)

TESTIMONY

The witnesses' testimony illustrated graphically the inadequacy of local remedies and the need for federal legislation to restore equity in the law.

HORACE GUYTON, A NEW JERSEY JANITOR

His union struck Wheaton Industries May '83. He went back to work after union stonewalled him on reasons. House vandalized, threatened with knife, told he was on 'Hit List', Guyton moved. Threats kept up. Knows his photo, phone and license numbers are displayed at union headquarters. Strike is over, persecution isn't.

Mr. Guyton has received no cooperation from law enforcement officials in his town:

The local law enforcement, they're not doing anything. I have had a knife waved in my face, my life threatened. I called the police. They referred me to the sheriff's department. The sheriff's department came after staying out in the picket line with the strikers for about 45 minutes, they come up to the building and they tell me that if the strikers call and say I am saying anything to them, they are going to come back and lock me up. That was it. Nothing else was done or anything.

. . . who can I call? I can't call the local police. I can't call the sheriff's department. They have already shown they won't do anything. I am on my own.

The witness made an eloquent plea for passage of the legislation to amend the Hobbs Act in order to restore order in the law:

So I am going to keep working like this, in fear. I don't know how long I can take this. . . . Something has to be done. I don't know if Congress will pass this Hobbs Act [amendments], but I am praying they will, and I wish everybody else gives you a prayer to get through this before something bad comes out of this, not only in this part of the country, but other parts where it is worse than this.

CHER MUNGOVAN, WIFE OF PROTECTED WITNESS

Husband Walter had $2 million-a-year construction business in Hawaii, paid his people union scale plus. Testified in federal probe about illegal union actions against his company. Repeatedly threatened, Walter now under federal witness protection program. Wife Cher doesn't know who or where he is. There life's work is ruined.

This witness continues to receive threats on her life for her courage in pursuing the injustices done to her family. She and her 12 year old son still live in constant fear and continue to receive death threats. They are victims of unchecked union intimidation and violence, and they are virtually unprotected by the law.

The only consequence for the union which vowed to break Walter Mungovan for his refusal to force his employees into a union (the employees had voted in a federally-supervised election to remain non-union) has seen several perjury convictions. Mrs. Mungovan illustrated the problems that many victims find when forced to turn to local or state government for help, and her testimony reinforces the need for federal legislation to fight this type of violence and lawlessness:

The thing that bothers me over the sentencing of Kapau [1] is he is a convicted felon with a prior criminal record. He produced for a sentencing report letters of support and admiration from Hawaii members of Congress and the local state legislators, and endorsements like that, which are obviously politically motivated, I don't know how we can ever hope to live in a society free of union violence.

Regarding the need to amend the Hobbs Act, Mrs. Mungovan impressed upon those present the need for equity.

We only ask for equal rights under the law and that the unions and members or people that they might hire be liable for their actions just the same as you or I are. We don't think that is too much to ask for considering what we have gone through and are still going through today. . . .

We only ask that the law be amended so that we stand a fighting chance in this thing.

I don't understand how, in effect, any member of Congress can condone the kind of activity that has destroyed my family, taken my husband from me, and is still refusing to vote for an amendment to the Hobbs Act.

SIGMUND KAYE, PHILADELPHIA CONTRACTOR

Was renovating a house with non-union workers. They were driven off and house wrecked by 15 burly men in gray union-owned bus. Kaye beat up by same men same day, resulting in hospitalization for spinal surgery. Same bus linked to other scenes of intimidation and violence.

As in the case of many other victims of this type of union violence, Mr. Kaye received virtually no assistance from police or other local law enforcement agencies:

I have worked with the Philadelphia police department, the DA's office, the United States Attorney. No one has made any efforts to bring about any restitution.

The police have done absolutely nothing. They have made . . . the linkage with the union . . . and that's as far as they've gone. They will not go any further. The FBI cannot get involved because it's not a Federal crime. The United States Attorney won't go near it . . . We cannot get cooperation from the authorities.

Mr. Kaye emphasized the need for federal legislation in order to combat this type of criminal behavior:

I'm hoping my testimony here along with other people here can try and get some Federal jurisdiction in combatting these crimes, because nothing is being done on a local level. Nothing is being done.

And again,

I just feel as though it's a hopeless case as far as any prosecution is concerned, because the Philadelphia Police Department are not willing to do anything. So I'm hoping that Federally we can do something . . . .

BOB WOHLSEN, PENNSYLVANIA CONTRACTOR

Company had contract to expand museum in Chadds Ford, Pennsylvania. Union activists blocked site and museum too. On 6-8-83 Wohlsen and 4 others videotaped it for anti-picketing injunction. They were beaten.

---

[1] Head of Hawaii carpenters union, sentenced only for perjury in the Mungovan case; vowed to break Walter Mungovan.

Wohlsen's head, stomach and back were kicked and punched. Needed brain surgery.

Mr. Wohlsen's testimony supported what our committee found to be frequently the case: it is not always a simple matter for law enforcement authorities to contain violence in these situations:

Right in the presence of state police being there, they punctured our tires and beat up our cars and cut our hydraulic lines on our trailers, right there.

Those policemen had a heck of a time in that violent situation . . .. Every time we call the police we are told 'there is nothing we can do.'

Mr. Wohlsen urged the Congress to act against such lawlessness:

"I would not pretend to know more about organized labor and this country's labor laws than what this distinguished committee knows. But I do know that I have never seen or experienced such a total and blatant disregard for the law and for the most basic of all human rights. No union, no individual, no matter how politically strong they may be, should have the power to be above the law. No one should be allowed to hurt another human being or to disrupt or attempt to destroy another person's business. If I committed a crime I would expect to be punished. Furthermore, I would in fact be punished. Why should a labor organization, its leadership and its members be any different.

. . . violence, vandalism, extortion and sheer terrorism are allowed to continue. If federal law created the various rights for the unions then the same body of law should also regulate labor's behavior and punish its misconduct. As a citizen and as a businessman I should be free from the type of problem that occurred on June 8, 1983. It is obvious that something needs to be done to further protect our rights.

BACKGROUND

Federal legislative attempts to control union violence began with the Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934, which was one of a number of bills resulting from investigations into racketeering, conducted in 1933 by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. With this legislation the Congress recognized that labor violence was a problem which state and local governments could not effectively control.

The Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934 set penalties for those who use or threaten to use force, violence or coercion to obtain money or property or other valuable consideration, or the purchase or rental of property, or protective services. However, this prohibition specifically did not include "the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee." In short, extortion against employers was illegal except in the case of wages.

This exemption led to a Supreme Court ruling in U.S. v. Local 807 (118 F. 2d 684 (2d Cir. 1941), aff'd, 315 U.S. 521, (1942)) that under the federal Anti-Racketeering Act of New York City Teamsters local could stop trucks as they came into the city and use violence and threats of violence to obtain from the truck owners the equivalent of a day's pay either to allow the teamsters to take the trucks into the city or in many instances for simply allowing the trucks to enter the city with their regular drivers. The statute did not include a prohibition against force or violence to obtain "the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employees," and in the U.S. v. Local 807 situation, the court oddly decided that there was a bona-fide employer-employee situation as long as the person who extorted the payments offered to do the work. This statute then did not protect the out-of-town drivers nor punish the behavior of the Teamster local.

This holding further indicated the court's preoccupation with the notion that if the objective were "traditionally legitimate . . . from labor's perspective" then the means to achieve the objective would not be viewed as extortion, no matter how violent.

Congress later acted to assure that such an interpretation would no longer be held valid by the courts by passing the Hobbs Act.

In 1946 the Hobbs Act was passed to eliminate the wage exemption. The debate on the Hobbs Act indicated that the Congress felt the Supreme Court wrongly decided the Local 807 case, and that the decision was a "distortion of the intent of Congress." (Congressman Halleck, see 91 Cong. Rec. 11900, 1945; also 88 Cong. Rec. 2071, 5334-35, 1942; 89 Cong. Rec. 3193, 3201-2, 3206-7, 3220, 1943.) In an effort to be sure that a future similar case would not be similarly decided, the Congress rewrote the 1934 Anti-Racketeering Act and took care to completely eliminate the exemption on which the decision in the Local 807 case was based. The Hobbs Act read as follows:

Whoever in any way or degree obstructs, delays, or affects commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in Commerce, by robbery or extortion or attempts or conspires so to do, or commits or threatens physical violence to any person or property in furtherance of a plan or purpose to do anything in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both.

Congressman Hobbs indicated during debate that his bill, while eliminating the wage exemption, was in fact designed to correct the deficiency in the 1934 federal law. The Congress was intent on making sure that a decision such as in the Local 807 case would not be repeated. Extortion this time was defined to include the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence or fear. (emphasis added)

The inclusion of the word "wrongful" is a key to continuing problems with decisions regarding union violence based on the Supreme Court interpretation of the Hobbs Act. The Supreme Court decided in 1973 in United States v. Enmons (335 F. Supp. 641 (E.D. La. 1971) aff'd, 410 U.S. 396, (1973)) that acts of violence could not be considered extortion under the Hobbs Act when perpetrated in furtherance of a legitimate labor objective. The Court felt that the word "wrongful" would not have been included in the definition of extortion if the Hobbs Act had been meant to apply to all labor violence.

A further look at legislative history, however, would show convincingly that the Enmons decision reached by the Supreme Court is in error, and that "wrongful" applies to all but legitimate labor activity, such as allowable peaceful striking and picketing.

In fact, Congressman Hobbs made it very clear during debate that a simple threat to go on strike would not be viewed as extortion under the Act, and stated that the word "wrongful" applied to the entire relevant section of the Act. Thus a strike is not "wrongful force" unless accompanied by violence. (See Nebraska Law Review vol. 59, No. 4 (1980) p. 893).

It is reasonable to assume that the insertion of the word "wrongful" was meant to assure the opponents that the Hobbs Act was not meant to restrict legitimate activity, and even if a strike were to be considered an application of force, it would not be wrongful force, unless violence were to be involved. This interpretation is certainly compatible with the legislative history as brought out by debate and is, in addition, compatible with the desire of the Congress to overrule the Local 807 decision.

COMMITTEE FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The testimony developed at this hearing reinforced findings made by the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, at its hearings held October, 1983, and by studies such as the Wharton School's comprehensive study on union violence published in 1983. In short, labor violence is all too frequently attributable to union strike tactics whch include premeditated efforts at intimidation through fear and violence, and such violence is not prosecutable under the Hobbs Act due to a misinterpretation of Congressional intent made in a 1973 Supreme Court case. Further, this type of violence is part of a widespread pattern serious enough to be a national problem.

The Anti-Racketeering Act, and later the Hobbs Act, were passed in an effort to curb labor violence. Unfortunately, federal laws passed to prohibit such violence have been virtually nullified through inadequate court interpretations of Congressional intent and legislative history. Yet the Congress never intended to make the distinction between union workers and other Americans.

In other words, as brokers of employee services, labor unions were to be limited in the use of force to the same extent as were other brokers or sellers of commodities; in either instance, the effectuation of the exchange through the use of force was to be prohibited as extortion. (Wharton Study, No. 25 (1983)).

H.R. 287 and H.R. 1514 are the most recent in a continuing effort to tighten up the Anti-Racketeering Act (later the Hobbs Act) in order to clarify Congressional intent and correct the interpretation of the Court.

These bills do not interfere with the legal right to strike or picket. They are aimed solely at restoring equity by making sure that labor violence is treated no differently than any other violence.

The legislation would amend the Hobbs Act so that violence or threats of violence "in the course of a legitimate labor dispute or in pursuit of legitimate union or labor ends or objectives" would be a violation of the Act and would be subject to federal prosecution. It would close the legal loophole in the law created by the Supreme Court interpretation of the Act in the Enmons case.

It is unfortunate that the Democratic leadership in the Congress has seen fit to ignore what is a serious nationwide problem, and has refused to allow these bills to be considered in the House. In the face of this deliberate inaction, cosponsorship of H.R. 287 and H.R. 1514 is particularly important as a part of the effort to force the leadership to allow consideration of this legislation.

This committee promises that the effort to rectify the current injustice will not stop with these hearings, and that our members will do all that is possible to achieve passage of H.R. 287, H.R. 1514 or similar legislation.

71-059 O-87-13 (Pt. 6)

Mr. McCLURE. Finally, Mr. President, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has done an excellent study of S. 1774. The chamber concluded that, first, labor violence is a major problem, second, local police are not controlling picket line violence, third, organized crime use a prime force behind labor violence, fourth, there is a broad spectrum of victims of union violence, including union members, and fifth, S. 1774, which merely restores the original intent of the Hobbs Act, is necessary to assure equal application of the law, ensure the preservation of legitimate rights, and being Federal extortion laws in consonance with other Federal labor policies. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the study by the chamber of commerce be printed in the RECORD.

(The study is printed earlier in today's RECORD.)

In sum, Mr. President, I am saddened by the outcome of our earlier vote. I suspect it will set the stage for increasing violence, and that, following some major tragedy involving extensive injury and loss of life, we will be back to the same point we are now, but with a different result.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I do not see anybody else on the floor seeking recognition. That being the case, and it being my understanding that the Senator from Iowa has yielded back all his time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I therefore yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back on this particular subject.

ELECTRIC CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now return to consideration of S. 426, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 426) to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection for electric consumers.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Pending:

Melcher Amendment No. 1785, to provide specific authority for wheeling of power under sections 211 and 212 of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. QUAYLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, earlier in the day the distinguished minority leader asked what we might expect for the remainder of the day. I am still hopeful that we can complete action on S. 426. It seems to me that this bill is not a major piece of legislation. It is important. I did not want it misunderstood. Again, we find ourselves spending several days on items that should be cleared up in several hours. We just finished one bill, the Airport Transfer Act, which took a couple of weeks. Now we are on the hydrorelicensing bill which should take a couple of hours. It has been 4 days.

I hope to complete action on that today and also the technical amendments to the crime bill, if not today, tomorrow; the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, S. 2231, or its companion bill H.R. 4451; S. 1923, the bankruptcy judges bill; and any Executive Calendar nominations that appear on the Calendar.

If we can complete action on this legislation, the items just mentioned, between now and tomorrow evening, I would suggest that if there were a Friday session, there would not be any votes. If we cannot do that, then I think we would have to indicate we would want to complete action. It may be that by Friday we will be prepared to proceed to the budget resolution and, if that were the case, that would probably be opening statement but no votes.

I must advise the distinguished minority leader and others that I just cannot indicate at this time with any certainty what the schedule would be on Friday or how late we might be here this evening or whether or not there would be votes into the evening.

AMENDMENT NO. 1785

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this bill has been pending now for some months. We had long proceedings before the Energy Committee. There were long hearings, and many long markups. It has been pending on the calendar for a long time.

We have been put on notice, by the distinguished Senator from Montana, as to his interest in the question of wheeling, and we know from the public power people that they have an interest in wheeling. We have yet to determine exactly what it is that they want, Mr. President.

Even if we were willing to say, "Yes," we don't know what is it that they want.

They put in an amendment yesterday and, as we were about to vote on that amendment the amendment was withdrawn. Apparently, today's amendment is not the amendment of yesterday.

One thing seems absolutely clear, Mr. President, that the representatives of public power are not willing to put their issues up before the Senate, and the reason is that those issues do not pass muster. They are not logical. They are not good for the country. They will not pass the Senate, and they know that. They would get defeated overwhelmingly.

Every time we ask "What is it you want," they say it is not what we said yesterday, it is something else.

Mr. President, this body works under a principle of unlimited debate, and I as much as any one here want to preserve that principle. I understand that that is a great right and indeed I stood on this floor to protest television in the Senate because I thought it might interefere with that.

I do not for 1 minute imply that the principle of unlimited debate and the right to filibuster is wrong. I think it is basic to this country. I think it is basic to the U.S. Senate.

The reason the principle of filibuster has been followed here for over a century, Mr. President, is that this is the body where very controversial issues are supposed to be allowed to be cooled and fully debated and fully considered, and the passions of the day taken out of those issues while you slow legislation down long enough to consider it deliberately. That is what we mean when we say the world's greatest deliberative body. Some people laugh when we say that. Maybe we have pretensions in trying to claim that. But that is what it is supposed to be, a deliberative body where we discuss things at some length.

But, Mr. President, that right to filibuster can also be abused. And it is abused when you take a bill which is overwhelmingly favored and well understood and because of the inability to come to a decision, the inability to be willing to risk anything on the floor of this Senate, they use that right inappropriately.

I do not want to say that they do not have the right, because the right is there to be used properly or improperly. But, Mr. President, when the public power people will not even tell us what they want or having presented the outrageously and illogical amendment of yesterday they are not willing to put that to a vote, I think that is a misuse of the power.

Mr. President, the public power people may think that they can abuse the Senate day after day, hour after hour, and not pay a price. But I want to tell you, as far as this Senator is concerned, I feel that they have abused the process, abused this bill, and if they expect the Senate seriously to consider what they have on their agenda, they better think again because they are abusing this Senate and abusing the process and I, for one, do not appreciate it.

Mr. President, if they will tell us what they want, if they will put out here on the Senate floor an amendment which we can debate and discuss on its merits one way or the other, I say that is fine. We do not claim that every jot and tittle of our legislation is not capable of change. But at least tell us what you want. At least say, "We want this or that," but do not just say we want something else besides that which is pending.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do hope that my colleagues can work this out. As I understand it, there may be a legitimate controversy involved but, again, there are a number of Senators and other interests in the country, not special interests, that would like to see this bill passsed.

I must indicate to my colleagues, maybe the Senator from Montana wants to kill it, and he may be able to do that, because once we get on the budget, then we have a full plate from then on. We have the defense reorganization bill, we are going to have the budget resolution, we will have the supplemental appropriations within the next week or so, and we will revisit Contra aid. So this bill will not see the light of day for some time.

But, it is leverage time around here. Everybody else is ready to pass it but one Senator. He wants something, and maybe he is being spurred by others who want something. That is the way it works. I do not quarrel with the system.

But I do suggest if we do have the amendments to offer, it does not serve any purpose to say, "Well, we don't want to take it up today; we want to take it up next week or the week after that."

If there are amendments, let us offer the amendments and vote on the amendments and see what happens and find out where the will of the Senate is. But we cannot determine what the will of the Senate is if nothing is offered.

So I hope my friend from Montana would offer an amendment, offer two amendments, offer three amendments, offer four amendments, and then let us act on the amendments and then finally dispose of this bill today.

I hope the managers of the bill are prepared to continue work on this bill into the evening.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the majority leader yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, it is my intention, without relinguishing my right to the floor, to move to table the pending amendment. I do not unduly wish to restrict the opportunity to ask questions, but, I think, under the circumstances, perhaps, while I have the floor, I better make that motion.

I am happy to yield to the Senator from Montana for a question, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. Well, I hesitate to say anything because it is so obvious it is not a question. But while the majority leader is here on the floor, let me explain my position on this.

Under the unanimous consent request, there must be an amendment at the desk. My purpose is just to save votes. If we have a useless amendment out there that cannot be acceptable, there is no reason to even vote.

We were able last evening to meet immediately after we finished discussing this bill, we were not quite adjourned, and I met with about 11 or so attorneys representing both sides of the issue, and included in that 11 was about 4 or 5, perhaps 6, of the committee staff attorneys. We were able to narrow down the points of contention. Staff attorneys of the committee were very timely in providing some proposals for alternative language that might be beneficial for both sides.

Representing the public power interests, on the other side, their attorneys provided some language that they thought might be beneficial and we would exchange those two sets of proposals.

I have had some opportunity during the past hour to discuss the proposals made by the public power attorneys to both the managers of the bill and the committee attorneys, and they are not acceptable. That is clear. On the other side, I have not had an opportunity to get back to the public power attorneys to see if they found any merit in what the committee staff attorneys propose. I suspect they will find some merit, but I think what usually happens is they will want to jiggle this or jiggle that. I do not know. But I simply have not had that opportunity.

It is nobody's fault. The fact is that we met until about 10 o'clock last night and broke up. The attorneys were gracious enough of their time and were industrious enough to provide some alternative language this morning and we have not had the benefit of letting each side digest it.

Now, there is an amendment pending at the desk and we can have a vote. It is not much of an amendment, as both sides know, both managers know. I just think it is a wasted vote. We would be better off spending our time getting to something else. We could continue the discussion of the issue—I do not mind doing that—after we have the vote, if we find that wise.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana is in good faith trying to find a solution to a problem, but nobody has yet been able to define or point to an area of compromise that is likely to satisfy people on both sides. I cannot see how the negotiations, unless the parties on one side or the other move away from their preconceived positions, that we are going to get to that agreement. So far there has been no such sign of accommodation, absolutely no such sign of accommodation. I do not say that of the Senator from Montana. I say that of the people whose interests he is trying to protect here in this process.

I agree with the Senator from Louisiana and his statement. While I regret to do it while there is still a good faith effort on the part of the Senator from Montana, that good faith effort simply is not producing anything in the current climate. I, therefore, move to table the amendment pending and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE] to table the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER]. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is absent due to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 77, nays 21, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Goldwater	Hawkins

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1785 was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MELCHER. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO 1787

Mr. MELCHER. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] proposes an amendment numbered 1787:

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

"Sec.——.

a. Sec. 211(c)(1) of the Federal Power Act, as amended is amended by striking the period and adding the following:

"Provided That the Commission in making its determination under this paragraph need only consider the existing retail customers and the current level of service to such customers of the utility potentially subject to the order and of the applicant." "

Mr. MELCHER. Madam President, the parliamentary procedure that is in effect now, because of the unanimous-consent agreement, is this: Only wheeling amendments can be offered—I have to offer them—and that language is subject to a second-degree amendment by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM]. Under these circumstances, an amendment must always be at the desk, and I would like to describe my purpose in sending these amendments to the desk.

The last vote we had was on an amendment that I do not think was in good order. While it was a symbolic vote on whether or not you wanted to broaden wheeling, the amendment itself had flaws.

This bill, S. 426, is a very good bill, I believe. I think it is a desirable and needed bill. The relicensing of hydrofacilities is proper, and it is a continuation of licensing in most instances, but not necessarily all, for the present utility company that has a license for the particular hydrofacility.

Some will argue that that is too generous. However, in my State, we have some hydrofacilities that would be affected by this bill; and if the utility that has that license should be relicensed, there would be a great deal of confusion, which I do not think would be worth the effort and probably would not be in the public interest.

So, all in all, I think the bill is good. But from the standpoint of the utility companies that are privately owned, it is a particularly fine bill, for obvious reasons. Some of the public power people say it is too good a bill for them; and, in a restrained manner, they have said: "If we do not really have preference in the relicensing procedure, we at least hope we would see some progress in another important area"—in two important areas, perhaps, but the primary area they are concerned in would be wheeling, I believe.

When the bill was in committee, two issues were raised, not immediately resolved in the bill before it was reported by the committee.

Senator METZENBAUM raised the issue of antitrust provisions. He thought the bill should carry with it an antitrust provision. I thought so, too. I had concerns about that.

However, nothing was done in committee, with the understanding that perhaps on the floor there would be consideration of an antitrust amendment. To the credit of the managers of the bill and the committee as a whole and Senator METZENBAUM, the antitrust provisions were worked out, an amendment was accepted, and it is now part of the bill.

On the question of wheeling, I reserved the right—I did not have to reserve the right; I described in the committee that I had some concern about wheeling and would attempt to provide some language for an amendment on the floor that would broaden wheeling somewhat. That is exactly where we are at now.

The point is, why is wheeling necessary? Why is any wheeling modification necessary? I am going to describe an instance that exists in a number of cases, in a number of areas, and then perhaps we can narrow the issue down as to what we are really describing as a necessary improvement in the bill.

If a municipality which has its own utility company is completely surrounded by a public utility, privately owned, and needs to have additional power, the municipality may seek, not from the public utility which surrounds it but from some other sources, the purchase of power, which would then have to be on a transmission line and brought to the municipality. That is the only way it could get additional power without going to the private utility company that surrounds it. There are two different examples of that one instance.

The private utility company that surrounds it may not have the capability of providing from its present generating sources, its own generation, any additional power. Therefore, if it were going to sell to the municipality, it would have to purchase it somewhere else, just as the municipality would, and have it carried into its area, and then on to the municipality.

The other example—and it easily could be the case—is that the private utility company did indeed have additional power to sell right there, but the municipality itself, a public utility, might care to have some competition—in other words, not just be a captured purchaser—and be able to look elsewhere to see whether the price was fair and, if it got a better price, perhaps to buy it from the other source, maybe even the same source from which the privately owned utility company would purchase it for itself.

Madam President, in that instance, getting what is called wheeling—that is, the transmission of the power into the municipality—into that captured municipality is something that obviously is in the public interest.

What about from the side of the privately owned utility? Are they somehow disadvantaged?

In the case where it is additional power needed and has to come into the area, they are not disadvantaged.

If the case is such that they do have power available to be sold to the municipality, they may be able to say they are disadvantaged. That might be the case.

What would be the procedure?

In either case, the municipality in a captured market would ask for a wheeling provision, perhaps from the privately owned public utility that surrounds it. If they make an agreement, fine. It is voluntary.

The other side of that is, what if the agreement that is offered, the best agreement they can get out of that particular private utility, is not satisfactory? In that instance, then, they could seek to go to FERC, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and say: "We cannot get a voluntary agreement on wheeling that is satisfactory. We seek to have one ordered."

PURPA was designed, it was passed in 1978, to resolve that difficulty, to allow this captured municipal utility to go before FERC, make their case to see whether a wheeling order under decent circumstances, decent costs, because, remember, it will be paid for, could be arranged.

Since the passage of PURPA in 1978, PURPA has not ordered one wheeling contract. So, it remains an unsolved problem. PURPA was designed to give a narrow window of opportunity to that municipality, this captured public utility, an opportunity to go before FERC and have a proper, fair, decent, wheeling order issued.

What I have described in this case in no way fits in with anyone's definition of pirating. I want to go to that point first.

Pirating is generally described as a utility company taking away a retail customer of another utility company.

This is not a case even of retail customers. This is a wholesale deal and it is one public utility versus another public utility, one of them publicly owned and one of them privately owned.

If the case were to be, and this is a different situation and should not be considered under the term "pirating," but if the case would be that the municipality felt that they were paying too much to the private utility that was surrounding them and they wanted an opportunity not to purchase power from them, because the price was too high, and wanted to go somewhere else and than needed a wheeling order to have it in there because they have no transmission lines, that is a different instance than I earlier described.

But many municipalities feel that that also should enable them to go before FERC and ask for a wheeling order.

What prevents FERC from giving the wheeling order because courts have narrowly interpreted the purpose and really the intention, the congressional intention, of PURPA when it was passed and said that under any circumstances when it can be shown at all that the private utility company that surrounds them, this captured market, would be of less value, the wheeling order cannot be issued, that PURPA hoped to open a narrow window of opportunity for the public utilities that were in such circumstances. But it failed. It has failed since the language itself in one of the sections has been interpreted to make it impossible to ever determine that the private utility company involved was disadvantaged.

What does disadvantaged mean? It means that their income will not be the same after the wheeling order was issued.

It could be greater. Obviously, if the captured market was going to buy more power for them or even had to get the power from outside because there was not any more power available, just the fact that they would not be wheeled over the private utility company's transmission lines, it is easy to see that they would not have as much revenue coming in. So it is a catch-22.

What was designed to be an opportunity, a narrow opportunity for the public utility that needed a wheeling order, cannot get it.

The argument is made that there has been a lot of voluntary agreements for wheeling and, of course, there have, and I applaud that and I think that is very good.

But a captured public utility says, "Well, in those instances we might have gotten a better wheeling contract. If there was some indication that it would be possible as a last resort to go to FERC, we might have gotten a better contract on wheeling," that is the price they paid for the power being transmitted to them would be on better terms, more acceptable to them from the standpoint of their consumers.

I mentioned consumers, I think erroneously some of the debate has centered against any broadening of wheeling at all on the basis, well, consumers would have to pay more. No; in the case of where any wheeling or before any wheeling order could be granted, it had to be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission that the consumers of the public utility that was going to do the wheeling were not adversely affected. That is taken care of and that would not be disturbed.

From the public power standpoint, they hasten to point out, "Well, we are also talking about the consumers of these public utilities and when they are captured when they cannot get a decent wheeling order or decent voluntary wheeling contract, then their consumers are hurt."

It is on balancing out one side versus the other and to the extent that wheeling contracts are higher than they should be or to the extent that a public utility cannot get a wheeling order, their consumers are hurt.

As far as the privately owned utility company consumers are concerned, nothing in this amendment I am now proposing or any that I would seriously offer and ask the managers of the bill to accept would I want to see that altered. I do not want pirating. I do not want cancellation of contracts. I do not want to hurt one set of consumers just to try to balance out another set of consumers. I do not want the ratepayers of a private utility company burdened.

PURPA, the Federal Power Act, does not allow that. I do not want to change that.

Maybe the question is in your mind, Is there any room to change anything? I believe there is. In good faith I believe this can be worked out. We have not satisfactorily worked it out now, but I have offered an amendment and I want to describe that amendment.

This adds to the one section of the Federal Power Act as amended by PURPA. It is something that would provide a narrow, limited opportunity for public utilities to be able to get before FERC and have FERC rule on the case whether or not a wheeling order under all the conditions of FERC could be granted.

This language was developed after a 3-hour session last night with the staff attorneys and some of the attorneys representing public power and some of the attorneys respresenting private utility companies. It is language that would attempt to satisfy a narrow opportunity.

Now the language itself actually came from the committee, except for one word that is charged. And everybody that has a copy of the amendment, both of the managers and their staffs, and the amendment at the desk shows that there is one word added. The Commission, that is the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, in making its determination need only consider the existing retail customers.

What is a retail customer? A retail customer is anyone that is a customer, any business, any home, anyone that buys electricity to use it for their own purposes. Is that different from some other customers? Yes, it is different from some other customers. The other customers are called wholesale customers. They are customers that generate electricity and sell it to somebody else.

So what this amendment does is allow one more opportunity for FERC to look at a wheeling request put to it by a public utility. The public utility is a wholesaler. They sell the electricity they have to consumers.

This amendment would give a very narrow, limited opportunity for public utilities to come to FERC and say, "We want to see, under all the constraints and all the provisions of the Federal Power Act, as amended by PURPA, whether or not we can get a wheeling order."

Now, there is not anything that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission must do. By the way, it is an adjudicatory process. Both sides present their arguments. Both sides say how the provisions of the Federal Power Act and PURPA will be satisfied by their application in the case. If it is a public utility and if it is resisted by the other private utility, they present their side and say. "You cannot grant it." One side says, "Can you grant it?" The other one says, "You can't grant it." And under all of the constraints of the body of law that has developed since 1935 under the Federal Power Act and particularly those amendments that were added by Congress in 1978 under PURPA, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission must make a decision.

Since 1978, there have not been any wheeling orders out of FERC. It is on that basis that I sincerely believe that the public power utilities, the rural electric companies, they have a right, a legitimate right, to approach the Congress and say:

Well, we would like some relief. We would like a chance. We want to progress too. We want to protect our consumers. And in wheeling, we are not always able to get a voluntary agreement for wheeling. Sometimes when we sign a voluntary agreement for wheeling, we think the terms are a little bit harsh, the costs are a little bit too much. But that is the best we can get. We felt under PURPA and the 1978 amendments to the Federal Power Act we might have a better shot, but it really has not worked out that way. So we are coming to you now and asking for some adjustment in a very narrow, limited way.

Now, Madam President, what about this whole deal? Why was it not resolved in committee? The whole argument in committee was over the relicensing of hydrodams. And, rightly or wrongly, public power made their case and their big pitch on holding in the law a preference, a preference that many of us felt really was a somewhat broader concept than what I had previously viewed as preference. In other words, the public power advocates, their leaders, in their approach to me was only on the issue of preference. They wanted a preference on the question of relicensing. Preference on a new dam, they could get that if it was a Federal dam. But on the relicensing of an existing hydrofacility, the committee rejected—and I do not argue with the committee on this point—rejected a preference to a public power entity to get the license of an existing hydrofacility instead of the current operator which, in most instances, in the larger ones at least, is the private utility company. So they lost on that. So, I guess, to put it in a phrase that might be easily understood, in their efforts in the committee, they shot there wad on that one and did not pursue vigorously this question of wheeling.

Now, it is fairly asked by the managers of the bill—and I concede they have some questions to ask of me—"Well, why wasn't it pursued more vigorously in committee?"

And I will say to the managers of the bill and say to the rest of my colleagues, that, in my judgment, it probably should have been pursued more vigorously in committee, but it was not. But having not done it then, that does not mean they should be foreclosed now. And that is my motivation for offering these amendments.

I believe that it is both in the public interest and fairness to broaden out in this very narrow gap the opportunity for wheeling.

I have only been speaking about public utility companies that want a wheeling order. Let me address something else that I feel is just as essential. There are some privately owned utilities, operated in the same way as the largest of the privately owned utilities, the United States. But they are small. They operate in the same way; exactly the same fashion.

And some small privately owned utilities can have the same set of circumstances facing them as I have described in this concept of a public utility, perhaps a municipal utility, completely surrounded by one privately owned utility, or in some cases more than one. But completely surrounded, in order to give wheeling it has to be done by the larger utility company. I think in fairness to them they ought to have some consideration in this bill.

Why the change? Why the one-word change in this language in the amendment? Why "retail"? They have added the word "retail" to it. I repeat. The word "retail" comes in this context, in this phraseology, that the Commission in making its determination under this paragraph need only consider the existing retail customers.

That is too narrow, very much too narrow, and to clearly make it fit with the rest of the Federal Power Act, and the purposes of PURPA, the amended Federal Power Act.

There is a very good solid argument to be made that to protect the ratepayers, the consumers of one group against the other, by adding the word "retail" we make sure that it is clear that it cannot be misinterpreted in any way, and that it would not be in conflict with any other part of the existing law that FERC must administer.

Madam President, I really believe what we have before us comes close to satisfying my purposes, and comes close to satisfying the purposes of the managers of the bill. I am not going to prejudge what their comments will be on this. But I can say that I have brought this matter up to clearly identify that with the retail customers. The answer I received back was that by just adding that one word would change the meaning of the amendment or go further than they are willing to go.

Well, that would seem to say to everybody, well, why even offer it? If it is going to be rejected, why burden the Senate with another vote if it goes to a vote?

There is only one purpose; that is, because it is necessary for an amendment to be at the desk to be discussed. That is the purpose. Under the procedures that we are under, if there is not an amendment at the desk, that forecloses and precludes any further amendments to be offered.

I would like to conscientiously persist for today, or tomorrow, if necessary, to reach an agreement where we have made some progress in wheeling. And, having been told by the managers of the bill that the amendment is not agreeable, it might indicate, well, we are just wasting the time of the Senate, or at least those of us who are here, and the staffs. That is true.

My preference would be to see if we can pursue this further, to reach and to solve all of the disagreements that are now here between the managers and myself, between the public power interests and some of the smaller privately owned utilities and the larger utilities to see whether we could not reach that.

But perhaps we have made some progress. At least I believe we have made some progress in identifying exactly what I am trying to accomplish, and what the problems are that are now burdening the public utilities and some of the very smaller privately owned utilities to see whether we cannot do as PURPA thought it would do in 1978—provide for that narrow window of opportunity to see whether or not a wheeling order could be made by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

I am strongly motivated by that one fact: that none—none—not one wheeling order has ever been made by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission since 1978.

I strongly have to admit that I am also encouraged by the fact that there have been since 1975 about 1,400 wheeling agreements voluntarily entered into. But I do also recognize the lament and the plea of public utilities that some of these wheeling agreements, although entered into voluntarily, were done as a last resort when we could not get an agreement out of FERC.

So wheeling is in the public interest. We can agree on that. Wheeling should be voluntary. It should be between both sides agreeing to it. All of us can agree to that. That is good business. The only one unresolved question is when they are not so good for the public utilities, can they have a little gap to get before the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and therefore see whether all the conditions and all the circumstances—that have to be met in the adjudicatory process under a Federal Energy Regulatory Commission wheeling order—will permit a wheeling contract to be ordered under their authority.

I do not believe that is too much. That, Madam President, is why I offered the amendment. I seek in good faith to continue the process to see whether we cannot arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this is the same song, second verse. What we are dealing with here is the so-called antipirating provision of the existing law. The antipirating provision of the existing law was put in to prevent wheeling from being used to defeat or to take away a utility's own customers, or, as I think the legislative history showed at the time, I think the phrase we used is to prevent a utility from having to use its own rope to hang itself.

Wheeling, as my colleagues know, is using somebody else's wires to carry electricity to another customer. What we did back in PURPA is to put in a provision that said you cannot use another guy's wires to steal your customers, or if steal is too strong a word, to purloin your own customers, or to entice your own customers, whatever word you want to use, and if piracy is too strong, then let us say to take your own customers.

In any event, Mr. President, it is very clear that should not be allowed to happen. And the Senate just overwhelmingly defeated a provision because it provided in large part for this antipiracy provision.

Now we have a new iteration of the same verse, because now we say that it is all right to pirate wholesale customers, but not retail customers.

What is the practical effect of that, Mr. President? Nothing at all because when you are talking about piracy, you are always talking about wholesale customers. I mean, let us say PEPCO serves the District of Columbia, which it does, and VEPCO serves outside of the District of Columbia. If VEPCO wants to use PEPCO's wires to get a customer, who do they want to get? Do they want to get my family? We use too much electricity, it is true.

But, Mr. President, they are not going to make a special contract for a retail customer. They are going after the wholesale customer, the big customer. They want to serve the whole U.S. Capital, or they want to serve some big industry here in the District of Columbia. A wholesale customer. That is what it is all about.

So here under the guise of a new amendment we have exactly the same tune that we had before.

Mr. President, I think the matter ought to be tabled. Before I yield to my committee chairman, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDNG OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Louisiana for the statement he has made and I will agree with him totally. I will take a few brief moments to add a little bit to the record because although we may be in kind of a holding pattern, I think it is important to demonstrate to the other Members of the Senate that indeed we are in that position of not seriously trying to amend but seriously trying to find a way to amend. Therefore, the object is not a current amendment but time.

I will take just a moment because I want to illustrate that we are tying to find that ground even if we take the time.

I will not belabor the subject, but it seems to me that we need to understand that the fundamental motive behind this amendment and the past amendment was not what the Senator from Montana says, regardless of his own concern in saying it, and I do not question the sincerity, but the fundamental change that is sought is to change the application of PURPA under the Federal Power Act. It is not to gain access before FERC. It is to change the way FERC would judge things if, indeed, they are before FERC.

The Senator from Montana has indicated a time or two that nobody can get before FERC and yet nobody has really felt the necessity to get before FERC under the Federal Power Act and the PURPA amendments because there have been 1,380 wheeling agreements filed before FERC which were the result of voluntary arrangements, which was the whole theory behind the statute. It is working.

During the same period of time in the last decade, there have only been five who even attempted to get before FERC by filing an application. One of those five cases in a decade that have even tried to get before FERC, two of them were resolved and settled between the parties, one was rejected and two are pending.

So it is not a question of whether or not there is access to FERC. It is obvious that it is there. The ones who have sought to are before FERC. Only five have sought to while 1,380 resolved it without having to go before FERC.

I have absolutely no evidence on the record or by whispers in the corridor, by surreptitious phone calls or other comments, that anybody who really wanted to get before FERC could not.

I think the real attempt by those who are pushing these amendments is to change the rules by which FERC judges whether or not wheeling should be ordered. The only real case that I have seen which causes that motivation is the one which was decided by FERC in the Southeastern Power Administration versus Kentucky Utilities Co., in which certain communities in Kentucky sought to get a wheeling order so that they could purchase from Southeastern Power. That matter was resolved before the Commission as the Commission applied the tests in the law to the very narrow issue which is now before us in this amendment.

This amendment is clearly designed to set aside the test that was used by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in that case and come up with a different result under the remaining criteria under the law.

Remember, this case was the case in which the Southeastern Power Administration was the applicant, the petitioner before the Commission. Southeastern Power Administration lost that case before FERC.

I have today received from the Administrator of Southeastern Power Administration a letter addressed to me as chairman of the committee. That letter is dated April 16, 1986. It says this:

> It has been brought to my attention that the Southeastern Power Administration (SEPA) and its inability to convince Kentucky Utilities Company (KU) to wheel 62 million MW of Cumberland power to the 12 municipal customers in its service area is being used as an example of why the law should be changed to allow the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to mandate wheeling.
> With the exception of the KU case, SEPA has had little difficulty in its other systems negotiating wheeling arrangements satisfactory to the private and public utilities involved.

The petitioner, the applicant, in the case which they lost, which now other interests are trying to have completely supplanted by a process that does not just reverse that but removes the criteria by which it was decided, that petitioner who lost the case says they do not have any problem, that this is not necessary.

There is not any fix required, according to the petitioner who lost. They lost that case, but they have been successful in every other instance.

The Administrator concludes the letter by saying:

> I only hope that Congress in its wisdom will not further encumber the power marketing process by adding another layer of Federal regulation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that letter appear in the RECORD in full at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY,
SOUTHEASTERN POWER ADMINISTRATION,
Elberton, GA, April 16, 1986.

Hon. JAMES A. McCLURE,
Chairman, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: It has been brought to my attention that the Southeastern Power Administration (SEPA) and its inability to convince Kentucky Utilities Company (KU) to wheel 62 MW of Cumberland power to the 12 municipal customers in its service area is being used as an example of why the law should be changed to allow the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to mandate wheeling.

With the exception of the KU case, SEPA has had little difficulty in its other systems negotiating wheeling arrangements satisfactory to the private and public utilities involved.

To mandate wheeling without assuring a benefit to the wheeling party would be a step backward. When enforceable law is not available, wheeling arrangements will only work when it is beneficial to both parties. In the case of KU, the municipals have not pressed for the benefits of the 62 MW and KU has failed to recognize the value that scheduling the 62 MW will have on its system.

I only hope that Congress in its wisdom will not further encumber the power marketing process by adding another layer of Federal regulation.

Sincerely,

HARRY C. GEISINGER, Administrator.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, the amendment addresses section 211(c)(1) of the Federal Power Act which requires FERC to reasonably preserve existing competitive relationships. That section was designed to prevent pirating. That section has been subject to a decision by FERC, the one to which I just referred.

At issue in that case, as I indicated, were the eight municipals who were seeking access by wheeling arrangements to SEPA power.

Whether the competitive relationship was limited to the eight recipients or involved all the wholesale customers of Kentucky Utilities was the issue. FERC decided it was the former.

This amendment would do more than simply reverse that decision; it would effectively prohibit any consideration of wholesale customers by restricting such considerations to retail.

Of course, section 211(c)(4) prohibits wheeling to ultimate consumers. The effect of the amendment is not to encourage wheeling in the public interest, but wholesale piracy.

Moreover, the losing party in the SEPA decision, as I stated a moment ago, has stated that there is no problem that needs to be fixed, in their opinion.

What this amendment seeks to do is not to fix the question of access but to change the terms, the conditions, and the pricing of wheeling and of power—not access, not competitive arrangements except as affected by terms, conditions, and pricing.

The Senator from Montana has said that he does not want to change the existing arrangement but his amendment does change the existing arrangement.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I would be happy to yield to the Senator without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. This term "pirating" has been used by both managers of the bill, just recently, in the last 15 minutes. So perhaps we have a different understanding of what "pirating" means. Pirating is clearly forbidden in PURPA. Pirating means the taking of retail customers within established franchise areas. To take this amendment lightly and not describe it accurately is not a very productive thing to do. Maybe we understand pirating differently.

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator's definition of pirating is only one and a very narrow limitation of what pirating is, because you can also pirate wholesale. You do not have to pirate retail in order for it to be pirating. It can be wholesale pirating and that is exactly what the amendment would permit—in my judgment.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield once more on that point?

Mr. McCLURE. I shall be happy to yield for a question without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the term "pirating" is used when one utility loses its customer, the same customer, to another, when dealing between just two utilities. So, since that cannot happen under my amendment, I wonder if we are not talking at cross purposes here.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator from Idaho yield so I may respond on this question?

Mr. McCLURE. I would be happy to yield to the Senator without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, when we confected this provision back during the consideration of PURPA, I had occasion, as the floor manager at that time, to explain what we meant by this "piracy." I would like to quote what I said at the time.

> The committee did not want to use the power of the Federal Government, at least not on the basis of the RECORD and the hearings we have had, to permit what some utilities regard as piracy. That is to require a utility to wheel the power from some other utility's generating plant to one of its wholesale customers; in effect, to require a utility to furnish the rope to hang itself or to risk losing some of its retail or wholesale customers.

That is from 123 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 16496, of October 6, 1977.

Also, Mr. President, in conference, the House conferees agreed with the Senate conferees that the wheeling utilities should be protected against the loss of its wholesale customers. Representative DINGELL, who was chairman of the House conferees at the time, said as follows:

> I have no objection whatsoever in protecting a utility in a reasonable fashion against what has been termed "piracy." Again, that is a utility within the boundaries of another utility being able to enforce the wheeling and being used to wheel in power from without.

That is from the joint conference proceedings at 2745 to 2746.

So, Mr. President, that word "piracy" was used at the time this provision was born, was originally put in the law. It was well understood. It meant principally wholesale, because that is where the main thrust comes. It also, as I read, meant retail, but principally wholesale.

So what we are talking about in this amendment flies right in the face of what we intended in that amendment at that time.

Mr. MELCHER. Would the Senator yield once more?

Mr. McCLURE. In just a moment, if I may. I do not mean to cut off the dialog, because I think it is instructive.

The Senator's amendment would amend section 211(c)(1), which deals with what the Commission must consider when they are looking at such a wheeling request. It attempts to inject in that criteria a provision that says that the Commission need only consider the existing retail customers and other things, and I shall get back to the other things in a moment.

At the same time, the existing section 211(c)(4) says:

> No order may be issued under subsection (a) or (b) which provides for the transmission of electric energy directly to a utility consumer.

Why would you want to say to the Commission that you can only consider one class of transmission when, in another case, they are prohibited from entering an order to serve it? That is nonsense on its face. I think if you analyze the southeastern case, as you must in order to understand the thrust of this amendment, it is clear that the criteria of looking at what kind of markets should be served and what they should consider in determining whether or not the wheeling should be entered turned on that definition. If you can change that definition, as this amendment seeks to do, you have removed the basis upon which FERC made the decision in the Southeastern case. That is obviously its intent.

Second, I would like to point, in addition to that, to another flaw in the existing amendment—not just that. That by itself is sufficient to ask for its rejection and I shall move to table in just a moment.

The Senator from Montana, I think, had asked that I yield with respect to this question of piracy. If I may yield to the Senator without losing my right to the floor, I shall be happy to do so.

Mr. MELCHER. First, Mr. President, I want to thank both the managers of the bill, the Senator from Louisiana for the statement he has just made and the Senator from Idaho, on this term "pirating." It has baffled me why something dealing only—putting aside the end consumer, who ought to be perfectly protected, not to be stolen, not to be pirated under the terms of PURPA and under the terms of the amendment—why the reference was made that the amendment was pirating. I see now there is a different interpretation.

Pirating, which has commonly been thought only to refer to the retail customers, has been adequately described to be broader, at least after the adoption of the PURPA, that no matter how the people out in the field use the term, for purposes of PURPA, piracy or pirating referred to both wholesale and retail customers. That clarifies the point. I thank the Senators very much.

It also brings up the question if this narrow case that we are considering would be to allow only FERC to consider those cases where the public utility company seeking the wheeling order was only going to use it for their own consumers, does that change the viewpoint of either of the managers? That is my primary purpose in this.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator repeat the question? I am not certain that I understood what he was getting at.

Mr. MELCHER. If the circumstances of the public utility asking FERC for a wheeling order were such that they were only going to use the power, under the wheeling order, to satisfy their own consumers, their own end consumers—they are not looking at anything. They have a territory. They have their own consumers—does that change the attitude?

Mr. McCLURE. Let me respond to the Senator in this way, because I think again it illustrates the difficulty we are having in coming to a meeting of the minds.

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. It is just not an interpretation of the term piracy. The Senator from Montana seems to believe that this is a relatively uncomplicated issue, a relatively uncomplicated relationship can be found.

This is an extremely complex issue with a tremendous number of very closely intertwined relationships defined in statute and interpreted by the courts. It is almost impossible for me to answer a question that is——

Mr. MELCHER. I understand.

Mr. McCLURE. Based upon the assumption that we can rather easily change one relationship without changing a host of others. That is precisely the point that is made in the Southeastern case and that is precisely the point for my concern about an amendment to the criteria, because in spite of the fact that the Senator from Montana talks about access to FERC, this is not an access question. All you have to do, if you want to get a matter before FERC, is file an application and you are there, bang. It is not hard. It is easy. Give me 35 bucks and a mimeograph machine, and I will get you there. I might not do much in terms of——

Mr. MELCHER. Getting anywhere.

Mr. McCLURE. What I get after I get there, but I can get you there. It is not a question of standing. It is a question of criteria upon which it will be decided once it gets there.

The second fallacy, I believe, in the pending amendment—and again a sign of the difficulty of dealing in this very complex area—it says in the face of the amendment that the Commission need only consider existing retail customers and the current level of service.

It is a much more complex computation than that under existing law and regulations because you must not look only at current levels of service to existing customers. You have to look at the potential.

For instance, any unused capacity in a transmission line might indeed be unused today under current service, but very predictably 2 years from now there will be no excess capacity. Under the terms of this amendment, if it were adopted—and it should not be adopted—you would then immediately be foreclosed from looking at the growth of service and the growth of demand upon that power line by the entity that owns the power line.

Now, this is not just a public entity versus private entity conflict, because such power transmission lines can also be owned by public entities. And the amount of capacity on that line is of vital concern to them not only in terms of their future marketing but also their current cost and also whether or not they have to immediately start making plans for the construction of other transmission lines. So there are a complex set of interrelated economic considerations as well as technical considerations in the determination of any issue concerning wheeling.

Mr. President——

Mr. MELCHER. Might I just impose on the generosity of the manager, the chairman of the committee, one more time?

Mr. McCLURE. I will be happy to yield to the Senator without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. I think I understood correctly that a tabling motion would be made at this point. I do so only to clarify the term "pirating" as understood by myself and as commonly used by the industry.

The red flag of "pirating" has been raised continually throughout this debate. Let me be clear. My amendment does nothing to permit "pirating," of end-use consumers no matter the size or amount of electricity they use which is clearly forbidden in PURPA.

As I use the term, "pirating" means the taking of retail customers within established franchise areas. For example, if a large factory is located within PG&E's service territory and wishes to seek an independent power supply, nothing in PURPA would permit it to seek such service from a different utility. Nothing in my amendment would permit it to do so, either.

My amendment goes to transactions between wholesale customers, who are also utilities, and their power suppliers like PG&E, who are also utilities. There has been some loose talk on the floor that permitting a small utility to purchase economy power and requesting wheeling through PURPA would result in "pirating." That is incorrect. PURPA was intended to permit small utilities to seek the most economic power supplies, within the constraints of their existing contracts and the capability of existing transmission systems. My amendment only corrects an interpretation that would preclude what was a chief purpose of the PURPA legislation.

The privately owned utilities have sometimes characterized sales to their smaller wholesale customers from other utilities and suppliers as "pirating." This assumes that wholesale customers—which are utilities, too—are viewed as captives forever by their present utility suppliers. PURPA was never intended to sanctify such bondage; it was intended to permit only whatever little extra flexibility the present contracts of small utilities gave to them to purchase more economic power supplies. That's what my amendment does.

SECTION 211 (C) (2) (A) AND (B)

The present version of PURPA forbids the issuance of a wheeling order by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission if the utility requested to do the wheeling would transmit any amount of energy required to be provided to an applicant pursuant to a contract or as currently provided by a rate schedule on file at the FERC. The first provision—section 211(C)(2)(A)—simply preserves existing contractual obligations agreed to by all concerned, and is not controversial. The real question is whether the second provision—section 211(C)(2)(B)—effectively bars any wheeling under PURPA. As presently stated, I believe it does.

My amendment would permit the implementation of the PURPA wheeling conditions subject to contract provisions, and all the other restrictions in PURPA. The filing of rate schedules at FERC covers both contracts and other schedules that are unilaterally filed by the private utility, and which can be changed at any time by the filing by that utility of an amendment or replacement by a new tariff. Thus I wish to avoid the situation where a utility can, merely by filing unilaterally at the FERC, impose new restrictions never agreed to by the party needing transmission and which the FERC may take years to resolve. The FERC, which oversees these schedules, has the duty to see to it that the utility is compensated at a just and reasonable rate. PURPA provides that the transmitting utility is compensated at a just and reasonable rate. What more does the transmitting utility need, want, or expect?

I cannot view any opposition to my amendment in this regard as anything but a desire to undercut the very purpose of PURPA: to permit wheeling that will permit an existing utility to improve the economics of its power supply.

Mr. McCLURE. I want the record to be very clear that the Senator's understanding of the term pirating may not be our understanding of the term.

Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment (No. 1788) was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1789

(Purpose: To amend sections 211 and 212 of the Federal Power Act of 1978)

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] proposes an amendment numbered 1789.

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section:

"SEC. . WHEELING OF POWER.

(a) Section 211 of the Federal Power Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. Section 824J) is amended as follows—

(1) Amend subsection (c)(1) by adding the words "between the electric utility subject to the order to transmit and its retail customers at the end of the subsection; and would not significantly alter existing competitive relationships between the electric utility subject to the order to transmit and its wholesale customers"

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I consulted with the author of the amendment. I would like to withhold the motion to table the amendment. I wonder if the Senator from Montana and others would agree to a time limit on this amendment of one-half hour to be equally divided between the Senator from Montana and the manager of the bill.

Mr. President, I make that unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Idaho for making the unanimous-consent request because it was within his power, within his rules, and within his rights to immediately after the amendment was stated to do as he did with the last amendment, just to move, seek recognition, he would get recognition over myself, and to move to table it. Of course that is a nondebatable motion.

Mr. President, that is not very good business for the Senate to be about, to send an amendment to the desk on an important matter, and not even have it discussed. These are not amendments that should be taken lightly. These are amendments now that we are attempting to arrive at a point of agreement, the discussion of what are the contents of the amendment, the purpose, the intention of the amendment, and how it would change existing law is very pertinent.

There is a case to be made, a case that I have been trying to make, and so far unsuccessfully—that it is so difficult for a public utility or a small utility to get a wheeling order, and to even approach FERC and file an application for such a wheeling order is not undertaken.

It is true as was earlier stated in the debate—for a small amount of money you could write out a paper, and ask to be heard on a wheeling order before FERC. That would get you standing. The whole process could start. But the facts are it is an adjudicatory process, and to approach it without detailed briefs, without being prepared to spend a great deal of time preparing those briefs, and meeting the requirements of the law is just wasted motion.

So since 1968 there has not been a successful application for a wheeling order yet for FERC. That was not the purpose of the 1978 amendments which we called PURPA. Those were amendments of the Federal Power Act. Those amendments were sought to give a narrow window, a narrow opportunity for the public utilities and the smaller utilities to go to FERC, and meet all the conditions that were required for satisfying the law to apply for a wheeling order.

I think that should be altered, particularly this bill. I think there should be some consideration given to their problems. While I have no desire to inconvenience my colleagues and to prolong the discussion on this question, I sincerely hope and I have faith that we can still resolve some language that will provide that opportunity. It will be narrow. It will be very limited. This is an amendment that would seek to do that.

If you read this amendment, and rather than ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with, I let it run so the clerk would read the whole amendment.

What this amendment simply does under the conditions that an electric utility that was going to transmit—that is, do the wheeling—there could be no disturbance of its retail customers, and the order could not be granted by FERC if it would significantly alter existing competitive relationships between the electric utility subject to the order—that is the one that would do the wheeling—to transmit, and also could not alter the existing competitive relationships to its wholesale customers.

I think we are prudent. I think we are a considerate body in the Senate. I believe this language is prudent, considerate, constructive, and in the public interest. I do not believe it does economic injury of any consequence to the utility company that would be ordered to wheel.

I think it would be a fine means of following the public interest, and enhancing the public interest.

Mr. President, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I regret this amendment is no more satisfactory than the others that the Senator has offered. As a matter of fact, it attempts to do in a different way exactly what the Senator from Montana has been attempting to do in every other amendment that has been offered. It is just a different approach to the same problem. Because we have a little time and because our friends are probably out getting a bowl of soup in anticipation that we will be here much later, which anticipation is perhaps correct, we will take a little of the time that is allotted for the debate of this amendment even though there is not much new to debate.

But I want to read from the decision of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in dealing with this question of a decision that we have made reference to before which is Southeastern Power Administration versus Kentucky Utilities Company. The decision recites the finding of the trial judge, the law judge who heard the case and made the decision and the interpretation of section 211(c)(1). I will not read all of the opinion. But I think it will illustrate some of the difficulty we are dealing with. I quote from that opinion.

What subsection 211(c)(1) directs us to consider is not clear. To be sure, it is certain that this subsection directs us to consider the changes the proposed wheeling would make in the competitive relationships of SEPA and Kentucky in a particular market. But the particular market we are to examine is not certain. The key phrase, "existing competitive relationships", is ambiguous. It can be interpreted in two ways. According to Kentucky, the phrase means the competitive relationships SEPA and Kentucky have towards the eight municipals to whom SEPA wants to sell. Thus, Kentucky argues that the market subsection 211(c)(1) directs us to consider is small. According to the Cities, however, the relevant market is broad. They argue that the phrase "existing competitive relationships" means the competitive relationships SEPA and Kentucky have towards all the wholesale customers for whose business both can compete.

If Kentucky's interpretation is correct, the factual analysis is simple. All we need to do is to compare what Kentucky and SEPA now provide the municipals and what they would provide if wheeling is ordered. Kentucky now provides almost all the power and energy the municipals require. And, because the 25 MW of power and 36,000 MWH of energy SEPA wants to sell is less than the municipals' total requirements, Kentucky would continue to provide substantial amounts of power and energy to them. But it would provide less. According to figures in SEPA's application, Kentucky would provide about 18 percent less of the municipals' power requirements and about 6 percent less of the municipals' energy requirements. SEPA, on the other hand, now provides nothing to the eight municipals. Hence if wheeling is ordered, SEPA would provide 18 percent of the municipals' power requirements and 6 percent of their energy requirements.

If the Cities' interpretation is correct, the factual analysis is much more complicated. As is done in antitrust cases, the product and geographic markets in which SEPA and Kentucky compete must be defined, market shares computed, and the changes examined.

The Cities defined one product market. They say that this is the market for wholesale sales of electricity. But they defined alternative geographic markets. Their preferred geographic market is the overlapping areas SEPA and Kentucky consider to be their marketing areas. This market consists of Kentucky's service area and the service areas of the utilities in Tennessee, Illinois, and Indiana with which Kentucky is interconnected. Wheeling SEPA's power and energy to the eight municipals will make no change in SEPA's share of this market and no perceptible change in Kentucky's share.

The Cities' other geographic market is smaller. It is defined by Kentucky's service area because Kentucky said that it did not seek to make sales beyond this area. The Cities include in this market Kentucky's wholesale sales to its distribution customers. They also include Kentucky's sales at retail. They do so on the theory that the communities now served by Kentucky at retail can always form a distribution system for whose business SEPA could compete. Kentucky currently provides almost all of the power and energy in this market. If SEPA were to sell power and energy to the municipals, Kentucky would, based on 1978 figures, provide about 1.3% less of the market's power requirements. The decline in Kentucky's energy sales in this market would be even smaller.

The changes in competitive relationships that are to be prohibited by subsection 211(c)(1) are also uncertain. The phrase "reasonably preserve" is not precise. But the statute's imprecision has not created much controversy in this case. Kentucky contends that an order whose effect is to transfer the supply of 18% of a market's power requirements and 6% of its energy requirements from one utility to another is not an order that reasonably preserves existing competitive relationships. No one disputes this contention if Kentucky has correctly interpreted the phrase "existing competitive relationships." The Cities, on the other hand, contend that a wheeling order that makes no perceptible change in one market and only a slightly noticeable change in another is an order that reasonably preserves existing competitive relationships. Kentucky does not dispute this contention if the Cities have correctly defined the markets. Thus, the resolution of this case turns on whether Kentucky's or the Cities' interpretation of "existing competitive relationships" is correct.

I could go on and read more of the decision, but the Commission ultimately decided in favor of Kentucky and against SEPA and what this series of amendments seem to do is to set aside that result.

I would again refer to the letter that we received earlier today from SEPA that said in spite of the fact that they lost the case in SEPA versus Kentucky, that indeed they did not see any reason why that fact should be reason to amend the law and make it more complex than it already is. Indeed, they said they have had no problem in negotiating wheeling somewhere else.

So all we have here is an attempt to overturn a decision or remove the basis of the decision where the affected party who was aggrieved by the decision in the first place says there is no problem and no reason to amend the statute.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this amendment is nothing more than another variation of the same theme seeking to get to the same objective that the Senate has rejected by tabling the amendments of the Senator from Montana in the past.

I have not accused the Senator from Montana of offering frivolous amendments, but I think he is trying in a variety of different ways to accomplish the same end—when that same end has been rejected by the Senate on several occasions, to attempt further to achieve the same ends by a different means begins to be abusive of this body. I will, at the appropriate time, make a motion to table this amendment also.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine minutes and 10 seconds.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I want to say at the outset that I am very pleased that the Senator from Idaho read a very pertinent part of the decision. I would think that the amendment really answers some of the questions that were weighed in balance in that particular decision and would clarify just what this particular section of the Federal Power Act and PURPA seek to do. I shall read the entire subsection, which is very short.

> No order may be issued unless the Commission determines that such order would reasonably preserve the existing competitive relationship between the electric utility subject to the order to transmit and its retail customers and would not significantly alter existing competitive relationships between the electric utility subject to the order to transmit and its wholesale customers.

I think that protects exactly what was being weighed in balance in the particular decision that the distinguished chairman of the Senate Energy Committee just read.

I am not trying to be frivolous. The distinguished Senator did not accuse me of it, of course. But I do not believe these amendments should be taken lightly. They are sincere, diligent efforts to get beyond the point where a public utility is constrained from getting a favorable decision out of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, which it is entitled to—entitled to on the basis of fairness, entitled to on the basis of good business, entitled to on the basis of competitiveness.

Those are all points that add up to what is in the public interest.

PURPA has been described to me by those who were very diligent in its passage as attempting to give some relief on the question of wheeling to these very encumbered, presently encumbered and were encumbered before, public utilities and small utilities that were not able to get wheeling agreements by voluntary means.

The case that was decided is a case in point, all right, but I do not believe that this amendment would be anything buy helpful in that particular decision. Therefore, it is constructive.

Mr. President, I will yield the floor. I do not want to force somebody else to take it, but I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, how much time remains in opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has 6 minutes and 56 seconds.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The Senator from Montana has more clearly stated at this juncture than ever before in debate in the hours we have had this measure before us that the objective is to change the statute with respect to wheeling in a way that increases the opportunities to enforce wheeling orders through FERC. We have been kind of hedging around the edges of that with the assurances that somehow, if we would just sit down and negotiate, we could find some language that would accommodate the necessities of parties on both sides. As long as the objective of that negotiation was relatively ambiguous, it was relatively impossible to make a clear answer.

But if, indeed, the objective is as the Senator from Montana has just stated, that the focus of his efforts today is to enshrine in the bill access to FERC to order wheeling for the sake of wheeling, then I think it is obvious that there is no compromise possible. If that is the objective, and I believe that it is, then this entire exercise is one that is dedicated to forcing one side to make concessions which that side cannot make. It is a classic case in which there are simply disagreements.

It is not a question of good faith and motive. It is simply disagreement. One side wants to do something and the other side does not.

I do not know how many times the Senate has to vote on that proposition. I have in my years here, as has the Senator from Montana, sometimes been on the winning side and sometimes I have been on the losing side. When a vote is held and I have lost, that generally is the end of it. I suggest that that is the only appropriate end of this.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I have sought rather diligently, from my point of view, in discussion with the staff and attorneys and managers of the bill, to narrow exactly what we are attempting to say would be an opportunity for captive utilities to be given a wheeling contract by involuntary means that is acceptable to them, or if not, at least to have their day in court before there is some opportunity for FERC to weigh all the pros and cons and all the complexities of the adjudicatory process that FERC has, to either come up with a granting of a wheeling order or denial.

The wheeling orders that are involuntary are somewhat affected by whether or not FERC might, under the law, grant a wheeling order. The overall constraint is that none have been issued since 1978 and therefore, the contention of some of the public utilities and some of the smaller privately owned utilities is that they are being burdened somewhat. That means their consumers' rates, because they have voluntarily agreed to wheeling orders, would have been somewhat less and their returns, in some manner, means it is less costly for them. That somehow has not been the case.

The very able and distinguished chairman [Mr. McCLURE] simply has not had any type of proposal that he believes is constructive. That sounds rather dismal after a day or two of discussing this. I believe it was Friday afternoon that we started talking about it and then yesterday and today. But I still continue to believe that there is a chance.

I do not really prefer at all to continue to offer amendments. My continuing proposal is that we should be sitting down and trying to determine, utilizing the sage advice of the staff attorneys, whether there can be something done here. We are not doing that now. I have hopes that we will, but under the situation as we have it, about all I can do is get that opportunity to attempt to do that in good faith, to continue to offer amendments. I would prefer to do otherwise.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCLURE. How much time remains on both sides?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has 28 seconds. The Senator from Idaho has 4 minutes, 15 seconds.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Montana, I can only repeat what we have said repeatedly. The Senator construes the fact that wheeling orders have not been granted as evidence of the failure of the system, a fault in the law. I think the statistics are quite the contrary. The facts are not in dispute; the interpretation of the facts is different.

In the last decade, there have been 1,380 voluntary wheeling agreements entered into by FERC. During that same period of time when there were 1,380 voluntary arrangements, there have been five applications filed for involuntary orders. Out of those five, two have been compromised and agreed to, one has been denied, and two are pending.

In the last decade, then, there have been 1,385 wheeling arrangements settled or contested in proceedings that FERC has looked at or approved in wheeling orders.

Out of that 1,385, one has been denied and two are pending. The Senator from Montana contends that that is a failure of the process, which simply strains my imagination beyond any possible other response. It is such a bizarre interpretation of facts as to defy any kind of logical response.

The law is working. The law has worked. It has not always produced the results that some parties wished. That is the crux of the issue and as long as that is the crux of the issue and the Senator from Montana seeks to change the existing law by the extortion of the time of the Senate, I hope the Senate will stay consistently with its position that indeed, the majority should rule, that we should vote, and that we should abide by the majority vote.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator from Montana is prepared to yield back the remainder of his time.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I shall just briefly state that this process of determining whether or not there can be language that can be helpful and constructive and agreeable is entirely within the hands of the distinguished chairman and the ranking member of the committee. They are managers. Whether or not we have faith that anything can be arrived at is entirely under their control, because under the parliamentary procedure, all I can do is offer an amendment and I am always subject to a tabling motion. I may not even be able to describe what the amendment is or talk about it or advocate it simply by a tabling motion as was done with the previous amendment.

On this one we have had a little discussion. I believe that it is meritorious, and I believe it might lead us to finding a proper solution. But I have to repeat while we are here on the floor and tying up the staff, that is not likely to happen. I regret it, but I am just constrained to say, believing as I do that there is a chance to reach an accommodation between all of us, my only way of keeping that opportunity open is by just continuing to offer amendments. But I do believe, Mr. President, that this amendment goes in the direction that we are seeking to go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, how much time is remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute remains.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 30 seconds?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield the Senator 30 seconds.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, we keep rehashing the same ground over and over and over and over again. There is no chance of settling this thing on the same basis. All we can do is sit here all night, and we may well do it, and vote over and over again. It is a nongermane amendment. It is not even germane to this legislation. Yet we keep voting over and over again on it, and I am prepared to do so.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. In my remaining 30 seconds, I just want to remind the body that this is extremely complex legislation. We took some time on this amendment because the amendment as offered to us was complex enough that we wanted to make certain it did what I have since concluded it did before we made a motion to table. It was plain on the previous one and it may be plain on the next one that it is just one in a series which seek to achieve the same objective and, if so, I will continue to offer the motion to table the amendments as rapidly as they can be offered.

Mr. President, we have also suggested that since it is complex, it is subject to hearings and indeed have offered that this be made a matter of hearings so that we can develop both the actual and technical basis upon which we might make a judgment as to whether an amendment should be adopted and, if so, what kind of amendment should be adopted to existing law.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I will be happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Is it the intention of the managers to pursue this matter on into the evening?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes; it is.

Mr. DOLE. And morning if necessary?

Mr. McCLURE. There does not seem to be any way to resolve the issue except just to continue in that fashion.

Mr. DOLE. I think all Members ought to be on notice that that is the plan of the managers. I certainly agree that we cannot make it easy for one person who wants to hold up the bill. If we are going to punish the other Senators, they ought to know that we are going to be here late, late in the evening, and I hope that they will make their plans accordingly. But I am perfectly willing to stay all night if necessary.

Mr. McCLURE. I hope it is not, but I am prepared to do the same.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments?

AMENDMENT NO. 1790

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER], proposes an amendment numbered 1790.

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof.

"SEC. .

Section 211(c)(2)(B) of the Federal Power Act is amended to read as follows:

" '(B) required to be provided to such applicant pursuant to a rate schedule on file, the existing terms of which have previously been agreed to by the applicant.' "

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous-consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the Electric Consumers Protection Act. This legislation will result, over time, in lower power rates for consumers. I think this is very important. My constituents think it is very important. Support of this act has generated a surprising volume of mail. Like any piece of legislation, the final product is not exactly as I wanted it. I doubt if any Senator in this Chamber is completely satisfied with this piece of legislation.

That, of course, is the heart of our system. We all know that we must together arrive at a position that is acceptable to the majority of the Members of the Senate. I think we have accomplished this and that the Election Consumers Protection Act will be passed by the Senate.

When that happens it will be due, in large part, to the dedicated work and fine judgment of my respected colleague, Senator JIM MCCLURE, the Senior Senator from the State of Idaho and the Chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Without Senator MCCLURE's strong leadership I am not sure that this legislation would be enacted. I want Senator MCCLURE to know how much he is appreciated and that his contributions to this body are well recognized.

WHEELING ISSUE

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the wheeling issue is indeed a complicated one, and I wanted to make my position clear. For me, the only questions are these: Will wheeling increase the likelihood of cheaper power being made available to electric consumers in Arkansas and the Nation as a whole? And if changes in current wheeling law will benefit consumers, what particular changes should be made?

As has been pointed out on the floor several times during the debate on this bill, it has been difficult to evaluate the various wheeling proposals we have voted on today. I voted to table most of the wheeling proposals presented today out of concern for the ratepayers served by the utility companies that would be forced to wheel. I think I would favor some changes in the law to force unwilling utility companies to wheel power, but only if the customers of the utility being forced to wheel are protected. In Arkansas, for example, if AP&L is forced to wheel, I want to make sure that the rates for AP&L's retail customers do not increase, and I have weighed the various amendments against this standard.

I appreciate the position the Senator from Montana is in. Many a good legislative proposal is withdrawn from consideration on the Senate floor in return for a promise of hearings, never to surface again. But having attempted during the last few days to research the wheeling issue in some detail, I have been surprised at how difficult it is to come up with reliable information about how wheeling would affect utility customers in my State and across the Nation. It is difficult to determine the winners and losers on the wheeling issue. For this reason, I really do believe this is a matter that could benefit greatly from hearings before the Energy Committee. I fear that it is too complicated a subject to be dealt with through floor amendments that have been only perfunctorily scrutinized.

As I said, I think some well thought-out wheeling amendments would benefit electric consumers as floor amendments without the benefit of fairly sophisticated hearings.

Mr. SYMMS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 9:30 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MOTION TO PROCEED TO CONSIDERATION OF S. 1774 WITHDRAWN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think this matter has been cleared earlier with the distinguished minority leader. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to proceed to consider S. 1774, the Hobbs Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION OF TESTIMONY BY FORMER SENATE STAFF

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution on behalf of myself and the distinguished minority leader (Mr. BYRD) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 384) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to represent, and to authorize the testimony of, former Senator Hansen and his past staff assistant in the case of Dow Chemical Company v. United States.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the plaintiff in a patent-infringement case against the Department of the Interior, now pending in the claims court, has subpoenaed a past employee of retired Wyoming Senator Cliff Hansen for deposition testimony in Washington this coming Friday morning. They have done so in the belief that that former staff assistant, Patty Howe, can provide information about early 1970's dealings between Senator Hansen's office and the Bureau of Mines important to plaintiff's contention that an abandoned mine backfilling process was entitled to royalties as a new technique.

This resolution would direct the Senate Legal Counsel to represent Senator Hansen, Pat Howe, and any other former staff assistant who may be asked to testify in the matter. It would also authorize their testimony to the extent required, except for anything privileged, but would not provide for the production of documents since none in the possession of the Senate are considered crucial to the case. If the deposition of Senator Hansen himself were to become necessary, it would take place in his home community without involving any travel.

Mr. President, I move adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 384) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 384

Whereas, in the case of Dow Chemical Company v. United States, No. 19-83C, pending in the United States Claims Court, the plaintiff has obtained a subpoena for the deposition testimony of Patricia Howe, past staff assistant to former Wyoming Senator Clifford Hansen;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(a) and 704(a)(2) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a)(2) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent former Members or employees of the Senate with respect to subpoenas issued to them in their previous official capacity;

Whereas, by the privileges of the United States Senate and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of former Members and employees of the Senate is or may be needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent former Senator Clifford P. Hansen, Patricia Joanne Howe, and any other past staff assistant of Senator Hansen who may be asked to testify in the case of Dow Chemical Company v. United States.

SEC. 2. That Senator Hansen, Patricia Howe, and any other staff assistant of Senator Hansen who may be asked, are authorized to testify in the case of Dow Chemical Company v. United States, except concerning matters which may be privileged.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FORD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I inquire of the distinguished minority leader if he is in a position to consider the following nomination on the Executive Calendar: Daniel Oliver, of Connecticut, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner and, if so, I would ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, that nomination has been cleared on this side. There is no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Daniel Oliver, of Connecticut, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not know of any other business we can take care of now, but it is my hope that before we recess this evening we might be able to take care of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, either the Senate bill or its companion House bill, H.R. 4551. I know the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] has an interest in that, along with the chairman of the Banking Committee, and I know both Oklahoma Senators have an interest. It is rather critical, as I understand it, to a number of banks in that State. So it is our hope that, if we cannot pass the extension with amendments, at least we could pass the 90-day extension this evening. But I understand the distinguished Senator from Illiniois would like to visit with the chairman of the committee, and he will be present momentarily.

I would also indicate that if we can complete action on the pending legislation and tomorrow do the technical amendments to the crime bill and the FDIC amendments, it would probably be possible to assure Members there will be no votes on Friday, but I cannot do that yet. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE GARN-ST GERMAIN DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS ACT

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to H.R. 4551, received from the House today, which is to extend for 3 months certain provisions of the Garn-St Germain bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wonder if my colleague would be kind enough to enter into a short discussion with me about this request he has just made.

Mr. GARN. I shall be happy to.

Mr. DIXON. As you know, may I say to my distinguished friend from Utah, we have a bill on the calendar, S. 2231, upon which he and I appear as principal cosponsors, which was unanimously voted out of the Banking Committee, after a short markup recently, that would address the problem of agricultural banks and problems on the farms around America. That has been pending for some time. It had been my hope that that bill, which also extends the 90-day extension, could be brought up tonight. There have been objections on my side, although it has been cleared on your side.

I understand in our discussion with the majority leader that he has indicated that, sometime before Memorial Day, that bill, S. 2231, would be called up for consideration in the Senate. Is that the Senator's understanding of what procedure will take place?

Mr. GARN. I say to the Senator from Illinois, that is correct. I would like to give a little more background so our colleagues know exactly what has taken place.

Last December, when the Farm Credit Administration amendments were on the floor, a very large bill, I very vigorously objected to including commercial, particularly agricultural, banks in with that jurisdiction, which was under the Agriculture Committee, and was successful at that time in defeating an amendment by the distinguished Senator from Illinois to add commercial banks into that bill. At that time I made the commitment that if that amendment were defeated, I would hold hearings—because we had not held hearings on this matter—that I would hold hearings expeditiously and that the committee would attempt to come up in our area of jurisdiction with a bill. I kept that commitment.

We did exactly that. The Senate Banking Committee passed a bill unanimously and we brought it to the floor and hoped to pass it the very day that we had approved it because we thought it was next to motherhood. Unfortunately, at various times we have had objections on both sides of the aisle over the last 2 or 3 weeks.

We have finally reached a point where it is impossible to bring it up. But we have another situation where title 1 and title 2 of Garn-St Germain that was passed in 1982 have expired yesterday, and there is some controversy over those provisions. But, nevertheless, I feel it is not responsible to not extend those, and I cannot hold those extensions for 90 days only hostage to these other provisions.

That is a brief summary of the background. The Senator is correct. We have talked to the Senator from Kansas, the distinguished majority leader, and he has agreed that he will make every effort to bring up the Garn-Dixon or Dixon-Garn bill, which still remains on the calendar with those other provisions in before the Memorial Day recess, so that we will have an opportunity to pass those provisions.

In the meantime, what I am asking to be called up now is a House-passed bill. It is a simple extension of title 1 and title 2 of Garn-St Germain until July 15.

Mr. DIXON. I thank my distinguished friend from Utah.

On that basis, I would have no objection to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4551) to extend for 3 months the emergency acquisition and net worth guarantee provisions of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this bill would extend for 90 days the emergency interstate bank acquisition authority and the Net Worth Certificate Program first enacted in 1982 under the Garn-St Germain Act. This authority expired last October and was extended to April 15 of this year. At the time, I had some misgivings to an extension in the absence of a comprehensive banking bill. However, I was given to understand that the extension would give us more time to deal with all the banking issues before the committee. Unfortunately, the 6-month extension has expired and we still do not yet have a comprehensive banking bill.

I am somewhat reluctant to agree to another short-term extension of these authorities. There is always the danger that the additional time will remove some of the pressure for dealing with the numerous banking issues before the Banking Committee including the closing of the nonbank bank and other loopholes, new powers for bank holding companies, restrictions on check holds, deposit insurance reform, a recapitalization of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and whether or not to permit the interstate acquisition of failing banks. Nonetheless, I have been assured by the chairman that he has no intention to delay the consideration of these issues and that he will schedule a markup of the Banking Committee on these issues, hopefully prior to the Memorial Day recess, but in no event, later than June 15.

I encourage the chairman to begin marking up a banking bill as soon as possible and I will be pleased to work with him in bringing a bill to the Senate. I would also like to serve notice that this is the last short-term extension of the Garn-St Germain emergency authorities that I intend to agree to. If the committee has not acted before the next extension I will offer an amendment to close the nonbank bank loophole as provided in S. 2851 which passed the Senate on September 13, 1984, but without the new securities powers for bank holding companies. While I continue to support these new powers, there is no credible prospect of getting them through the Senate and the House if the Senate Banking Committee has not acted definitively on the issue well in advance of the July 15, expiration date. In fact, given the lateness of the session, it may already be too late.

In order to send this extension promptly to the President, I have agreed not to offer the 90-day moratorium on nonbank banks contained in S. 2231. Nonetheless, the record should reflect the fact that this moratorium passed the Banking Committee unanimously and in my view accurately reflects the view of the committee on the nonbank bank issue.

Mr. President, the Senate has already acted to close the nonbank bank loophole when it passed S. 2851 by an overwhelming vote in September 1984. Unfortunately, the House took no action and the legislation died in the last Congress. However, our intention to close the nonbank bank loophole in this Congress with a July 1, 1983, grandfather date was clearly reaffirmed in a joint statement of Senator GARN, Congressman ST GERMAIN, Congressman WYLIE, and myself on October 8, 1984. There should be no confusion that this is still our intent. As a matter of fact, I am opposed to any grandfather date and will do my best to eliminate the limited grandfather rights contained in the 1984 legislation that passed the Senate. Whatever the date, there is, in my view, no sentiment on the committee for the Treasury position that the nonbank bank loophole should be made legitimate.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have serious reservations about the pending bill. It permits the regulatory agencies to continue the net worth certificate program authorized by the Garn-St Germain Act and to extend the emergency acquisition authority contained in that act.

I have no problem at this time with the emergency acquisition provision, but I have grave concerns about the net worth certificate program. I believe that program is the worst kind of bookkeeping gimmickry.

Now let me describe how this program works. If a bank has $20 million in net worth, it issues a certificate to the bank board. At this point the board issues a promissory note for $20 million to the thrift. Now, what happens? The thrift is able to report net worth of $40 million, not $20 million.

Now, obviously, the institution's net worth has not doubled. There has been no additional equity put into the bank. It is a paper transaction, and all of a sudden the bank is in a position to say now its net worth is $40 million, not $20 million. No matter how you slice it, that is false reporting.

A November 1984 General Accounting Office report noted that the Federal Home Loan Bank Board counts appraised equity capital in determining a thrift's net worth.

Among other things, appraised equity capital includes the unrealized and unrecorded equity in office land, buildings and improvements owned by the institution.

The GAO also noted that the accounting community does not believe that the promissory notes given to institutions by the bank agencies can be recorded as assets. Incredibly, these notes are the heart and soul of the program. They are the vehicle used to boost an institution's net worth. Yet, accounting professionals say the whole deal is bogus.

The GAO report flatly stated that the use of the appraised equity capital and net worth certificates is deceptive:

> The bank board and the FDIC release financial reports submitted by thrift institutions that could be misleading or confusing to the general public . . . these reports contain financial information reported in a manner that is not recognized under generally accepted accounting principles for general purpose reporting to the public . . .
> Without proper disclosure, the public could inadvertently rely upon such reports to make business and investment decisions.

The job of regulators is not to keep insolvent institutions open through smoke and mirrors accounting like net worth certificates. Indeed, such regulatory shenanigans disguise the real problems facing our financial system and will only make the coming shakeout that much more traumatic.

The argument has been made that this procedure that has been in effect since 1982 has made it possible for a number of institutions to be saved, and to put their own house in order. True and good, and well enough. That was in an era of good times, sort of boom times, stronger economy, less inflation, and as a consequence, I can understand what has occurred.

But let us take the other side of the coin. The other side of the coin is we could have gone in reverse. There could have been a negative reaction. The net worth could have gone down. There is an old point of view and philosophy that in some business deals the first loss is the cheapest loss. If some of these institutions have to fold up because they are insolvent or because they do not meet the regulatory requirements, maybe that is the way it should be rather than fooling the American people, the depositors and those who do business with the institution; that is, the institution is truly solvent or the institution is more financially stable than is the reality.

I am pleased that the bill before us does not include provisions regarding energy and agricultural banks. But I am terribly disturbed that the agencies themselves are proceeding with plans to permit bank capital to fall below regulatory minimums, and to allow loan restructuring that is nothing more than flim-flam.

Mr. President, I believe that it would be far better to let some banks fail now than to engage in artificial, misleading, and dangerous accounting games that will inevitably result in far greater outlays in the future. We are not helping anyone with these kinds of accounting games, least of all the farmers, the oil men, the banking, and the investing public.

I share the concern of my colleagues in the Senate with respect to each of those groups but I believe that we should not create an illusion of soundness and safety when in fact we know that the institutions we purport to help are neither sound nor safe.

I intended to object to consideration of this bill but I will not do so. But I want to make it clear that in the next 90 days I believe the Senate should get down to the job of really addressing our banking problems. The Senator is tired of delay and Band-Aid solutions. I will oppose with all my energy any further extension of the net worth certificate program as well as any other legislation that includes dubious financial and accounting procedures.

I might say that I have inquired of the regulators with respect to the observations that I have made on the floor here this evening. They do not challenge the accuracy of my representation. They say as a matter of fact I am exactly on target. But they also say that there are circumstances in which they are bound by the legislative requirements, and also with respect to other considerations where they have felt it advisable not to insist upon conformity with their previously prescribed regulatory procedures.

I wanted for some time to offer some consumer banking amendments as well as some corporate takeover amendments. I have waited patiently in order that there might be an opportunity to offer such amendments. I intend to do so on the next banking bill that comes to the floor. I will not do so with respect to this legislation because there is some timeliness and some need for prompt action.

Having said that, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GARN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President I will certainly not take the time of the Senate this evening to debate this issue with the Senator from Ohio.

There are a couple of observations which I think need to be made, however. I do not necessarily agree with the Senator's characterization of the legislation. But it is easy to be a critic when you are not involved in the problem. I was one of those critics who opposed the House provisions that were much more severe as far as capital maintenance guaranteeing that institutions should stay in business. Senator PROXMIRE and I proposed modified provisions of title 1 and title 2 of Garn-St Germain, and insisted on that in the conference with the House.

You can call it flim-flam, if you want. It worked. Sitting in the position of responsibility as we did in the Banking Committee in 1982 it was not boom times. The highest of troubled institutions on the list were both banks and savings and loans, and more failures were handled in 1982 than any year in the history of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board combined—all of them combined. They handled more.

So let us not characterize 1982 as a year of low interest rates and boom times. We were in the middle of a depression with the banking industry, and particularly with the thrifts on their back. So this worked. It is not desirable theoretically. I agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Sometimes when you have the responsibility, you are sitting on that kind of a problem, and most of the Senate does not know about it, and we have saved a lot of institutions. Maybe there was a better way to do it. But we saved a lot of institutions. If we had not had these provisions, you would have then given the FSLIC and the FDIC the only alternative of simply allowing these institutions to fail and saying OK, I will let your depositors with $100,000 get their money back—with vastly depleted funds those over $100,000 would have lost.

The assisted merger route has solved some very difficult problems. And we still are in the situations with very large troubled institutions which under the circumstances the regulatory institutions of this country have handled very well.

I also suggest that if the Senator from Ohio is impatient about banking legislation, he does not know what it is like to be frustrated and impatient as one who has tried for 5 years to push comprehensive legislation, and has not been able to do so since 1982. Even when in 1984 on the floor of this Senate we passed by a vote of 89 to 5 a comprehensive banking bill, the House of Representatives would not go to conference with me. I was ready to produce a bill again last year, and the House would not produce anything to even go to conference on.

The problem is in the House of Representatives. This body has been ready, willing, and able with the help of my distinguished ranking minority member for the last 3½ years to pass additional legislation.

So I suggest to the Senator from Ohio before we get into this battle in 90 days, because we will, and then we will debate it fully, but I would like him to make his speech on impatience on the House of Representatives floor or the House Banking Committee because Senator PROXMIRE and I are just as impatient if not far more so than the Senator from Ohio. But we will continue this debate at a later date.

I ask that we proceed to third reading and pass the bill.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I respect the fact that the chairman of the committee and ranking minority member have made a serious effort to provide banking legislation that moves us in the right direction. I appreciate the fact that we passed legislation in the Senate, and the House has not acted. I am not quite willing to go over, and make a speech on the floor of the House because I guess that would mean I would have to be a Member of the body. And I am quite happy where I am.

Mr. GARN. By unanimous consent they will let the Senator do anything.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Having said that, let me say that the Senator from Utah is right, that in 1982 we were not in boom times. I think what I meant to say was that since that time the economy has improved considerably. It is a fact that a number of institutions that might have gone under have not gone under. But that does not mean that it will always be that way.

I am trying to suggest to the Senator from Utah, and the ranking minority member, my good friend, that I think we have to take another look at this whole issue of net worth certificates. I think to do less than that might possibly provide a day in the future when we all regret the fact that we have not been more concerned about those net worth certificates.

I look forward to working with the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wisconsin.

I have no objection to proceeding forward with the passage of the legislation this evening.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio for not objecting this evening. I ask for third reading.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I appreciate the speed at which the distinguished majority leader has moved to proceed to the consideration of this most important piece of legislation.

Given the nature of the economy in Oklahoma and throughout the Southwest, it is important that we in Congress provide the flexibility necessary for the banking industry to survive these turbulent times. I remain hopeful that this legislation will address those very concerns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H.R. 4551) was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to thank the Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Banking Committee, and also Senator HELMS, the chairman of the Agriculture Committee. Some of us had an amendment that we wanted to put on this bill. We were able to work it out together with their help, particularly with the help of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and George Dunlop of the Agriculture Committee. So I think that we will be able to make some helpful moves with respect to the Farm Credit System in the near future. I thank my colleagues.

I also thank the Senator from Illinois, Senator DIXON, as well as Senator NICKLES, who is particularly active in our effort.

So I think we have made some progress with the Farm Credit System which will become apparent soon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that we are now in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DOMENICI]. The Senator is correct.

THE INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, last week I had the privilege of being in Mexico City for a week as part of our delegation to a meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which was held in that city.

The other member of our delegation was Mr. LOUIS STOKES, a Congressman from Ohio, who served this Nation very well in the period of the week we were representing the United States.

I would remind my colleagues that the Inter-Parliamentary Union began in 1899, and that the United States has been a member of that union for a great many years. At the present time some 104 nations belong to it and more than 80 nations were represented by delegations at Mexico City.

Let me further remind my colleagues, Mr. President, that the aims of the Inter-Parliamentary Union are to promote personal contacts between members of all parliaments and to unite them in common action to secure and maintain the full participation of their respective states in the firm establishments and development of representative institutions in the advancement of the work of international peace and corporation, particularly by supporting the objectives of the United Nations.

Mr. President, as I said, some 80 nations were present in Mexico City. We had a series of vigorous debates on the subjects which were assigned to the two so-called study committees of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Additionally, on a supplemental matter that the conference agreed to make up, I would note that the initial matter which the conference had to dispose of was an attempt on the part of the Syrian delegation to inject into the deliberations of the conference the following emergency supplemental question:

The aggression against Libya by the American Armed Forces constitutes an eminent danger for the security of the Mediterranean basin and for world peace.

This, mind you, was with reference to the Gulf of Sidra incident and not to the events which have occurred this week.

I am pleased to be able to report to my colleagues that we were able to defeat the Syrian effort to inject this as a supplemental matter for the Inter-Parliamentary Conference to consider, and that the speech made on behalf of the United States was made by Congressman LOUIS STOKES. He did a very good job.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of the sppech delivered by Mr. STOKES at that time be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS MADE BY THE HONORABLE LOUIS STOKES

Mr. President, the U.S. delegation would like to register its strong opposition to the adoption by this body of an emergency supplementary item on a recent event in the Gulf of Sidra as proposed by the delegation of Syria.

The situation to which the request refers does not constitute either an emergency or an imminent danger to world peace or Mediterranean security as stated in the Syrian proposal. The incident is over. There have been no U.S. armed forces in the area referred to in the proposal for more than two weeks. Moreover, the event to which they refer occurred in internationally-recognized waters.

At the time, the United States was merely exercising its right of free navigation in international waters, as recognized in international law, and as exercised by other maritime powers. Additionally, there was no aggression against Libya. The U.S. Naval Forces returned fire, only when attacked in international waters by Libyan forces, as was our right under international law.

I would like to emphasize that it is not the United States which constitutes a threat to world peace and to the security of the Mediterranean. The real threat in that part of the world and to world peace comes not from this brief encounter in the Gulf of Sidra, but from the current, ongoing, policy of state-supported terrorism which has resulted in the deaths of so many innocent civilians. I refer to the most recent terrible loss of life and limb in airport and plane bombings in Rome and Vienna. When the threat of terrorism is so imminent as to cause fear of travel around the world, this is the danger to world peace.

Mr. Chairman, this conference and this Interparliamentary Union has on its agenda some very important world issues. It would seem that our work as parliamentarians would be greatly enhanced if we were to concentrate our time and efforts, not on divisive issues, but on those issues which were stressed by each of the speakers at our opening session this morning. I submit that our time would be better served on issues of substance such as combatting world hunger, helping the undeveloped and under-developed nations of the world, furthering the cause of nuclear disarmament, combatting the rising tide of terrorism, and fostering world peace.

The proposal before us is divisive; it is not relevant to any presently existing situation; and it is not in furtherance of the principle of fostering world peace. I urge my fellow parliamentarians to vote against the adoption of this proposal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, in the course of deliberating upon the regularly assigned subjects in front of the conference, with respect to one of them which had to do with the halting of the arms race and effective disarmament with special regard to the militarization of outer space, nuclear weapons and chemical weapons, and to the effective combating of international terrorism, and to the elimination of hotbeds of tension in the world and in particular to the efforts of the Contadora Group in Latin America, it was my privilege to make a statement on behalf of the United States in connection with our views about handling the problems of terrorism in the world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of that speech appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT T. STAFFORD

Mr. President, my fellow delegates, permit me to begin by expressing the deep appreciation of the U.S. delegation to our Mexican hosts. We convey our congratulations to Senator Riva Palacio Lopez on his ascendancy to the presidency of this conference. Our delegation looks forward to strengthening the warm ties with our neighbor state of Mexico.

Today's agenda item encompasses a multitude of issues—each important, pressing, and complex. In the limited time available, little could be accomplished by attempting to address them all. I will confine my remarks, therefore, to an issue which at this very hour threatens to damage irreparably an already fragile international order. I refer to the scourge of international terrorism. Until the world community of nations cooperates on combating terrorists our collective capacity to compose our differences on other issues will remain in serious doubt. Cooperation on combating terrorism is a minimum requirement if the phrase "community of nations" is to retain any meaning.

Trends in international terrorism in recent years have grown steadily worse. Since 1977 the number of terrorist incidents resulting in fatalities has risen each year. In 1985 alone, according to U.S. Government figures, 812 incidents of international terrorism occurred, a marked jump from the 597 incidents in 1984. Of the 2,223 casualties in 1985, 926 were fatal.

This increase in fatalities is linked directly to the fact that state sponsorship of terrorism has become more prevalent. State-sponsored terrorist organizations enjoy many advantages. Funds, training, arms, explosives, and communications become readily available. The organization can concentrate less on maintaining itself and more on committing its terroristic crimes. According to one study, state-sponsored terrorist incidents are likely to be eight times more lethal than non-state-supported incidents.

As gruesome as this bloody calculus may be, it fails to convey the truly reprehensible nature of the slaughter of innocents. An Air India jet explodes over Ireland and 329 lives are simply snuffed out. The families are left to grieve, unable to place the theft of their loved ones from them within any rational context. A U.S. Navy diver is mechanistically executed on the tarmac in Beirut. A wheelchair-ridden elderly American, enjoying a sea cruise in his last years, is shot aboard the Achile Lauro and dumped in the Mediterranean. His murderers laugh about it while cynically denying their crime to the world media. A 9-year-old girl is gunned down in Vienna and dies in her father's arms.

Within the last week, two explosions in Europe continue the slaughter. Four innocent passengers were sucked out of an airplane after a bomb ripped a hole in its side. But for the grace of God, the bomb, targeted to murder everyone aboard, took only a limited number of lives. And just this last weekend, an explosion ripped through a Berlin nightclub, killing two and maiming dozens of others. Human limbs were scattered throughout the room.

Yet, unbelievably, not only do states equivocate in the face of this carnage—the perpetrators of these terrorist crimes are actually publicly excused. Rather than meeting swift condemnation and sanction, state sponsors of terrorists meet silence, accommodation, and—let's call it for what it is—appeasement.

No amount of rhetoric about failing to address the so-called "root causes of terrorism" can justify this kind of wanton violence. The Secretary General of the United Nations has spoken out repeatedly on this issue, constantly stressing that nothing can justify terrorism. Numerous resolutions of the Security Council and the United Nations General Assembly have affirmed this fundamental principle.

Time and again those who excuse terrorist acts refer to political conflicts needing resolution. They never admit that those committing these heinous crimes—almost without exception—have no interest in resolving conflicts. Their interest is in exacerbating conflict. Possessed by a pathological nihilism, they pursue their bloody work. In the Middle East, for instance, how else does one explain that terrorism invariably rises when hints are made of progress in the peace progress? For those who doubt it, one need only speak to the family members of Zafer

Al Mazri, the slain mayor of Nablus in the occupied territories.

For its part, the United States' policy on international terrorism is unambiguous: We condemn terrorism in all its forms no matter where it occurs. The United States does not negotiate with terrorists, we will not pay ransoms, nor will we alter our policies to meet terrorist demands.

United States citizens have suffered a disproportionate share of terrorist attacks, and most of those attacks have occurred overseas. We naturally prefer that countries in which terrorist incidents take place apprehend and punish those responsible. But the United States has the right under international law to employ the means necessary to defend its citizens. This is true in those cases where countries prove unwilling or unable to perform their obligations under international law. In recent days the American public understandably has been clamoring that their Government exercise this right vigorously.

No easy solutions exist to combat terrorism. One thing is clear: Combating terrorism is a collective responsibility of the international community. The U.S. Congress has recognized that multilateral approaches must characterize American diplomacy in the fight against terrorism. The U.S. Senate gave prompt approval to ratification of international conventions which criminalized aircraft hijacking, the taking of hostages, and violent acts against internationally protected persons. Both bodies of Congress have supported United States antiterrorism assistance to a wide spectrum of countries. In last year's foreign assistance legislation, these funds increased substantially.

Congress has also passed legislation granting broad authority to the executive branch to impose economic sanctions against state supporters of terrorism. Frequently criticized for being ineffective, economic sanctions are effective only when they receive the requisite degree of international collaboration. We have no illusions that unilateral economic sanctions can work over the long term; multilateral sanctions can. At a minimum, economic and military assistance should be cut off for countries which aid and abet terrorism. Such a provision has existed for years in U.S. law, and the authority granted to the executive branch was expanded in 1985.

Parliaments can help create the formal mechanisms to combat terrorism, but the legal instruments will only be as effective as the willingness of governments to execute them.

The aim of collective effort should be to deny terrorists safe haven so they may be apprehended, prosecuted, and punished. Nations which provide safe haven for terrorist criminals merit the sternest censure of the international community.

The American people have difficulty understanding why this achievable goal eludes the world community of nations. Americans suffer from no illusion terorrism can be eliminated, but they do believe that with the cooperation of nations it can be reduced markedly. Failure to pursue this task vigorously threatens to damage irreparably an already weak faith in the ability of multilateral institutions to address pressing world problems. The terrorists will then have won. They will have converted the world citizenry to their own nihilistic vision: We live not in a world where nations, with effort, can compose their difference; we live, rather, in a hobbesian world, a lawless world, a world where no one can be trusted, a world where everyone is sentenced to a perpetual war of all against all.

(Mr. GRAMM assumed the Chair.)

Mr. STAFFORD. Later on, in connection with a second matter before the Conference under the heading of constitutional problems with acceleration of economic advancement of developing countries by the improvement in the terms of international trade by using science and technology to advance the welfare of mankind in general and particularly the health and well being of the elderly, Mr. Stokes made a speech on behalf of the United States on that subject.

I ask unanimous consent that that speech be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. LOUIS STOKES—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION PLENARY SESSION, APRIL 10, 1986

MR. PRESIDENT, FELLOW DELEGATES: The economic advancement of the developing world through improvements in science and technology and the terms of international trade is a goal towards which we all are striving. It is a problem to which the Interparliamentary Union has devoted much attention. Most recently at our last conference in Ottawa we debated and adopted resolutions on how best to deal with the increasingly onerous debt burden of the developing countries. Today I would like to turn your attention to one area of the overall problem of the economic advancement of the developing world which has not received the attention it deserves—the care and well-being of the aging. This is a problem confronting not only the developing world, but the developed world as well, and it is a problem which the application of science and technology can do much to alleviate.

I advance this cause to you today on behalf of our esteemed member of the United States delegation, CLAUDE PEPPER, a renown advocate of the elderly. For many years, Representative Pepper was chairman of the Select Committee on Aging in the U.S. House of Representatives of the U.S. Congress, a committee which has done much to bring the problems of the elderly to national attention and to initiate programs to effectively deal with this pressing issue.

We are currently witnessing an unprecedented increase in longevity, brought about, in large part by the achievements of science and technology. Medical advancements, in particular, have nearly doubled life expectancy in my country in the past eighty years. In the less developed countries it is projected that there will be an increase in those age sixty or over of nearly 475 million between 1980 and the year 2020 and that in those years, worldwide, the population of those over sixty will more than double, to almost one billion. By the year 2000, it is estimated that more than sixty percent of the world's sixty and over population will be living in the developing world as a whole. And it is the population of those age eighty and over which is increasing most rapidly, particularly in the developing countries.

These drastic demographic changes must not be viewed as a liability but as an asset. History tells us repeatedly that age associated with wisdom and experience has always been a benefit to mankind, whether in the developed or the developing world. Yet, the rising numbers of aging people worldwide poses significant challenges to those in our societies, including parliamentarians who are most concerned with improving the quality of life of their citizens and providing them with the basic prerequisites for a productive life of well-being and self-respect. The modernization process, with its accelerating urbanization and social atomization, has placed great strains on the ability of many developing countries to deal with their rapidly increasing populations and particularly with the vast increase of those over sixty five years of age. The living conditions of the elderly in many of the large cities of the world provides a grim picture of poverty, lost hope, and neglect.

While they could do much to improve the lot of their own growing numbers of elderly persons, the more developed countries can and must contribute to the well-being of the elderly in developing societies. Forms of assistance in ths area would include provision for increased manpower training, research, services and information-sharing, or, in other words, putting the advances in science and technology to work in providing better living conditions and more productive roles for the elderly. Unfortunately, significant obstacles remain to making these advancements readily available to the developing countries, including the lack of financial resources in those countries and the scarcity of trained manpower to adapt them to the special circumstances and traditions of the various nations of the developing world.

It is here in this vital area that parliaments can play a more positive and productive role. They must ensure that the question of aging becomes an integral part of their country's national development plans and guarantee that multilateral efforts already undertaken within the context of the United Nations are effectively implemented. An important catalyst for the increased national awareness of the problems of the elderly has been provided by the World Assembly on Aging conducted by the United Nations in 1982. This assembly adopted a comprehensive plan of action entitled "The International Plan of Action on Aging" which identified and defined many of the vital questions concerning the rapidly aging world population.Unfortunately, implementation of the plan—which depended primarily on action undertaken at the national level—has not progressed sufficiently, and the United Nations aging unit in Vienna responsible for coordination of this international plan has suffered a significant budget cut.

It is the duty of parliamentarians, direct representatives of all strata of their populations, to focus the attention of their governments on these shortcomings and to suggest improvements. The need for continuing dialogue between parliamentarians of developed and developing countries is, therefore, critical. It is here that the Interparliamentary Union, a unique assembly of parliamentarians from all over the world, can play a special, relevant role. Through its biannual conferences and its periodic specialized meetings, the Interparliamentary Union provides a useful and convenient framework for fostering international dialogue regarding the problems of the aging. These problems are inherent in the fact that all individuals have a variety of minimum needs, of which the physiological demands of food, shelter and health care are only the most elemental sustenance of life. There are also requirements for safety, security, and self-respect achieved in part through engagement in society, job participation, and the ability to control one's physical destiny. The elderly are no exception to this notion and parliaments as well as governments must strive to meet these requirements.

The United States delegation believes that the Committee on Economic, Social, Cultural, and Environmental Questions constitutes the logical forum within the Interparliamentary Union for discussions of the aging problem. We would welcome all proposals or resolutions concerning the well-being of the elderly, as a promising first step in the Interparliamentary Union's consideration of this issue.

For its part, my delegation has proposed a resolution calling upon the Interparliamentary Union to give regular and serious consideration to the health and well-being of the elderly at its future meetings. Specifically, it proposes the establishment of an ad hoc committee which would regularly consider and report to the economic and social committee and to the IPU conference on the status of various initiatives to improve the well-being of the elderly and to make recommendations on how parliamentarians in general, and the Interparliamentary Union in particular, can play a useful and relevant role. Through the establishment of such an ad hoc committee, my delegation believes that the Interparliamentary Union can eventually make an effective contribution to advancing the welfare of an often neglected segment of our societies. Universal, international concern for the aging of the world is an investment in the future of us all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, there followed these plenary session speeches efforts in three different drafting committees, two drafting committees working for the so-called political committee on the questions of halting the arms race and the other items I mentioned in connection with it, and a second drafting committee in connection with the situation in the Mideast, with a third drafting committee working under the economic committee, the committee which I just mentioned with respect to economic advancement, and so on.

Mr. Stokes served on the drafting committee for the economic committee. It was my assignment to serve on the drafting committee on the arms race, terrorism, and hotbeds of tension in the world, particularly the Contadora group.

I am pleased to be able to tell my colleagues that with respect to the arms race, terrorism and the Contadora group, the drafting committee was able to agree on the text of a resolution which was unanimously approved by the drafting committee and subsequently by its parent, the political committee, and, subsequently, by the entire conference of delegates representing more than 80 nations. It was unanimously adopted.

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FINAL EDITION

75TH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE—ADOPTED BY ACCLAMATION 12 APRIL 1986.

The Contribution of Parliaments:

(a) To the halting of the arms race and to effective disarmament with special regard to the militarization of outer space, nuclear and conventional weapons and chemical weapons

(b) To the effective combating of international terrorism

(c) To the elimination of hotbeds of tension in the world and, in particular, to the efforts of the Contadora group

Draft resolution adopted without a vote by the 1st Committee Rapporteur: Mr. L. Moreau (Argentina)

A. AS REGARDS DISARMAMENT

The 75th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Expressing grave concern over the danger of nuclear catastrophe threatening mankind, which can lead to the end of civilization on earth,

Guided by a desire to save mankind from the threat of nuclear and conventional war and to clear the way for the phasing out of the nuclear and conventional arms race on earth and its prevention in outer space for an overall reduction of the danger of war and for the establishment of trust as an integral component of relations between States,

Gravely concerned at the danger posed to all mankind by an arms race in outer space, and emphasizing that outer space should be used for the benefit of mankind for peaceful purposes,

Supporting ongoing efforts aimed at eliminating nuclear and chemical weapons and taking note of recent important proposals made in this area by the United States of America and the USSR, including a programme for the elimination of those weapons by the year 2000,

Expressing great satisfaction at the results of the Soviet-American Summit Meeting in Geneva and the accords reached there to accelerate work at the Geneva negotiations on nuclear and space arms with a view to preventing an arms race in outer space and to ending it on earth, and to give new impetus to the efforts made in other areas of arms limitation and reduction, and at strengthening strategic stability.

Taking note of the Joint Declaration issued on 22 May 1984 and reiterated on 28 January 1985 by the Heads of State or Government of Argentina, Greece, India, Mexico, Sweden and the United Republic of Tanzania addressed to the nuclear-weapon States, urging the end of nuclear weapon testing and the end of the nuclear arms race,

Reaffirming previous resolutions to the effect that the establishment of nuclear-weapon-free zones, such as established by the Treaty of Tlatelolco, could contribute to the security of States in such zones, to the prevention of the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to the goals of general and complete disarmament,

Taking note of the recent signature by the majority of States of the South Pacific region of the South Pacific Nuclear-Free Zone Treaty, adopted at Raratonga (Cook Islands) on 6 August 1985,

Welcoming the adoption by the United States General Assembly at its jubilee 40th Session of a resolution on the prevention of an arms race in outer space,

Stressing the responsibility of Parliaments and parliamentarians for the prevention of war, including nuclear war, the halting of the arms race and the preservation of peace,

Reaffirming the provisions of the final document of the Tenth Special Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, the first Special Session devoted to disarmament, according to which the gradual reduction of military budgets on a mutually agreed basis, particularly by nuclear weapon States and other militarily significant States, would contribute to curbing the arms race and would increase the possibilities for the reallocation of resources now being used for military purposes to economic and social development, particularly for the benefit of developing countries,

Regarding vigorous assistance to nations' striving for peace and international security as its special duty in accordance with Article 1 of the Statutes of the Inter-Parliamentary Union,

Conscious of the responsibility imposed on the parliamentarians in all countries as the elected representatives of the people in relation to the safeguarding of international peace and security,

Emphasizing the obligation of all United Nations member States, in accordance with Article 2 of the United Nations Charter and the Helsinki Final Act, to renounce the threat and use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, and recognizing the right of all States to individual and collective self-defense as laid down in Article 51 of the UN Charter,

1. Expresses its determination to assist in every way in the taking of important and effective decisions at the existing negotiations that would bring about the prevention of an arms race in outer space and its termination on earth, thereby freeing billions of dollars of funds for the realization of constructive aims and assistance to peoples seeking to promote their economic and social development;

2. Welcomes the results of the Soviet-American Summit Meeting in Geneva, the understanding reached by the President of the United States of America and the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union that a nuclear war should never be fought and cannot be won, and the agreement to accelerate work at the Geneva negotiations on nuclear and space arms, and expresses the hope that further meetings of such a kind will follow;

3. Appeals to the Parliaments of all States to support the earliest possible verifiable elimination of nuclear and chemical weapons, and the reduction of conventional armaments, and urges all States to reconfirm their commitment to the 1925 Geneva Protocol in view of the recent UN reports on the use of chemical weapons;

4. Emphasizes the importance of regional efforts towards the creation in the world of nuclear-weapon-free zones, aimed at the final objective of general and complete disarmament, on the basis of arrangements freely arrived at among the States of the region concerned;

5. Calls all States and their Parliaments to contribute to the earliest possible conclusion of a fully verifiable comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, this treaty to be understood as being part of a broader process of nuclear disarmament and by no means as a substitute for drastic reductions in nuclear weaponry;

6. Urges Parliaments vigorously to promote the objectives of the peaceful use of outer space in the interests of the keeping of international peace, as well as the observance of existing international space treaties;

7. Urges the Parliaments of the countries participating in the Geneva Conference on Disarmament to help to increase the efficiency of the conference and to start early negotiations within its framework to promote nuclear disarmament, ban nuclear weapon tests—an effective verifiable ban which would encompass all nuclear Powers—and prevent nuclear war;

8. Calls upon the Parliaments of the countries participating in the Vienna negotiations on the mutual balanced reduction of military forces and armaments in Central Europe to make a contribution to carry out the agreed reductions in the conventional arms and military forces and to expediting the achievement of mutually acceptable agreements at the Vienna negotiations to this effect;

9. Urges the Parliaments of the countries participating in the Stockholm Conference on Confidence and Security-Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe to facilitate its early conclusion and the adoption of a document which would include concrete, mutually acceptable and verifiable confidence-building measures, as well as a reaffirmation of the principle of the non-use of force;

10. Urges all Parliaments and National Groups to take steps aimed at encouraging effective decisions which promote worldwide disarmament on earth and peaceful use of outer space.

B. AS REGARDS INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

The 75th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recalling resolution 40/61 of the General Assembly of thee United Nations on terrorism adopted on 9 December 1985,

Recalling the existing international conventions relating to various aspects of the problem of international terrorism, inter alia, the Convention on Offences and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, (Tokyo, 14 September 1963), the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft (The Hague, 16 December 1970), the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation (Montreal, 23 September 1971), the Convention on the prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic agents (New York, 14 December 1973), and the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages (New York, 17 December 1979),

Deeply concerned by the acts and practice of international terrorism in all its manifestations, which threaten the lives of people and lead to their death,

Convinced that widespread international cooperation is likely to prove most effective in dealing with the problem,

Reaffirming the principle of self-determination of peoples as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the inalienable right to self-determination and independence of all peoples under colonial and racist régimes and other forms of alien domination, and upholding the legitimacy of their struggle, in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter and of the Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the principle that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person as stipulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Convinced of the importance of expanding and improving international cooperation among States, on a bilateral and multilateral basis, which will contribute to the elimination of acts of international terrorism and their underlying causes and to the prevention and elimination of this criminal scourge,

Convinced that Parliaments must play an important role in the search for solutions to the problem of international terrorism,

Considering that the taking of hostages and abductions are offences of grave concern to the international community, having severe adverse consequences for the rights of the victims and for the promotion of friendly relations and cooperation among States,

1. Unequivocally condemns any terrorist acts, manifestations and practices, regardless of the place where they are committed or their author;

2. Deeply deplores the loss of innocent human lives which results from such acts of terrorism;

3. Further deplores the pernicious impact of acts of international terrorism on relations of cooperation among States, including cooperation for development;

4. Appeals to all States to recognize the importance of a policy opposing the making of concessions to terrorists as the international community cannot succumb to the blackmail of terrorists, and appeals to all Parliaments to implement such a policy;

5. Affirms the obligation of all States in whose territory hostages or abducted persons are held urgently to take all appropriate measures to secure their safe release and to prevent the commission of acts of hostage-taking and abduction in the future;

6. Appeals to all States that have not yet done so to consider becoming party to the existing international conventions relating to various aspects of international terrorism;

7. Requests the States which have signed the relevant Conventions to promote full and strict implementation of their provisions;

8. Calls on all Parliaments and Governments to take all appropriate measures at the national level with a view to the speedy and final elimination of the problem of international terrorism, such as the harmonization of domestic legislation with existing international conventions, the fulfillment of assumed international obligations and the prevention of the preparation and organization in their respective territories of acts directed against other States;

9. Strongly demands that Governments and Parliaments adopt all necessary measures—without excluding a boycott of the airports concerned—in order to prevent terrorist acts and to punish perpetrators of acts of terrorism;

10. Calls upon all States to fulfil their obligations under international law to refrain from organizing, financing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in other States, or acquiescing in activities within their territory directed towards the commission of such acts,

11. Urges all Parliaments to ensure that their countries are not used as safe havens for those who resort to terrorism and that terrorists are brought to justice in accordance with the provisions of the relevant international conventions;

12. Requests the Parliaments and Governments of all States to strengthen international collaboration in order to find ways and means of action which are most adequate in fighting acts of international terrorism,

13. Further urges all States to co-operate with one another more closely, especially through the exchange of relevant information concerning the prevention and combating of terrorism, apprehension and prosecution or extradition of the perpetrators of such acts, the conclusion of special treaties and/or the incorporation into appropriate bilateral treaties of special clauses, in particular regarding the extradition or prosecution of terrorists;

14. Calls on all Parliaments to urge their respective Governments, unilaterally and in co-operation with other Governments, as well as relevant United Nations organs, to contribute to the progressive elimination of the causes underlying international terrorism and to pay special attention to all situations, including, inter alia, colonialism, racism and situations involving mass and flagrant violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms and those involving alien occupation, that may give rise to international terrorism and may endanger international peace and security;

15. Emphasizes the necessity for Governments and Parliaments to work towards the full and effective application by national authorities of the security regulations for the suppression of attacks drawn up by various international organizations in the field of civil aviation, in particular the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO);

16. Encourages the appropriate international organizations to work towards the achievement of further enhancing the security of air travel, as well as the elimination of terrorism on the seas;

17. Requests the Parliaments of the nations represented in the Inter-Parliamentary Union to work towards the implementation of this resolution.

C. AS REGARDS HOTBEDS OF TENSION

I. As regards hotbeds of tension in general

The 75th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Convinced of the urgent need to eliminate hotbeds of tension in the world not only to avoid regional conflicts but because of the danger that such conflicts could evolve into a world-wide confrontation,

Aware that urgent action should be taken by all States to end colonialism, interference in internal affairs, apartheid, racial and other discriminations and all forms of aggression and occupation which constitute a grave threat to international peace and security, particularly in Africa, Asia and the American continent,

Emphasizing the importance of the adoption, by consensus, by the United Nations General Assembly in November 1985, of a solemn appeal to States in conflict to put an immediate end to hostilities and to settle their problems through negotiations, as well as of the obligation of member States of the United Nations to solve situations of tension and conflict and existing disputes by political means, to refrain from the threat or use of force and from any intervention in the internal affairs of other States,

1. Recommends that the Inter-Parliamentary Council study the possibility of organizing Inter-Parliamentary meetings on questions of peace and security in the regions and areas concerned, with a view to the elimination of hotbeds of tension in different parts of the world and the promotion of closer co-operation among nations, taking into account the proposals of some National Groups for such a meeting in Asia;

2. Urges Parliaments and Governments to support all moves to strengthen, on a permanent basis, democratic, representative and pluralistic systems and to promote national reconciliation, human rights, and fundamental freedoms, such as respect for personal integrity, freedom of the press and freedom to establish trade unions, and in particular affirm the importance of upholding and implementing the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the two International Covenants on human rights;

3. Urges Parliaments and parliamentarians to recommend that their respective Governments rigorously apply the relevant resolutions of the United Nations and other international organizations with a view to the final elimination of the hotbeds of tension in Africa, Asia and the American continent;

II. As regards support to the efforts of the Contadora Group

Gravely concerned about the situation in Central America which is characterized, as mentioned in the Preamble of the Contadora Act on Peace and Co-operation in Central America, "by a serious decline in political confidence and by frontier incidents, an arms build-up, arms traffic, the presence of foreign advisers and other forms of foreign military presence, and the use by irregular forces of the territories of certain States to carry out destabilizing operations against other States in the region",

Convinced that the signing of the Contadora Act on Peace and Co-operation in Central America by all States of the region and also those having ties and interests in the region should provide the necessary framework for eliminating tensions and providing peace and security in Central America and encouraging co-operation and economic integration,

Emphasizing that all Central American countries have the right to live in peace and security, free from outside influence from any source and that military action will not solve the problems of Central America,

Considering also that the action carried out by the Contadora Group on behalf of Peace constitutes an example of the search for a peaceful and regional solution to a regional conflict,

Noting with satisfaction that the countries co-operating in the Contadora Group, i.e. Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela, are being supported by Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uruguay in their initiative to bring about a negotiating process intended to lead to a peaceful settlement of the tensions in Central America,

Considering that the Caraballeda meeting recommended the implementation of a package of concrete actions which are aimed at the consolidation of peace in the region and must be carried out simultaneously, and that it also adopted the proposal of the President of Guatemala for initiating a process of consultations which could lead to the establishment of a Central American Parliament and that such an initiative would contribute to better understanding of the problems of the region,

1. Urges all the parties to the conflict to sign the Contadora Act on Peace and Co-operation in Central America, taking into account the last appeal made by the Governments of the countries of the Contadora Group and the Support Group at their meeting in Panama;

2. Urges all States which have ties in the region to facilitate the signature of the Contadora Act on Peace and Co-operation respect the undertakings given under the Act, and subscribe to the documents of accession and support to the Contadora Act, provided for that purpose;

3. Reaffirms the right of all countries of the region to live in peace and security without foreign interference;

4. Supports initiatives for regional integration in Central America, such as the creation of a Central American Parliament and any other forms of co-operation and agreement;

5. Supports Costa Rica's policy of active, perpetual and unarmed neutrality;

6. Reaffirms of the inalienable right of the nations of Latin America to join development, within a framework of effective regional peace, democracy, co-operation and solidarity;

7. Takes note of the latest declaration of the Latin American Parliament on the occasion of its meeting in Guatemala, which reasserts "its will of emancipation and defends self-determination, non-interference in the internal affairs of other States, pluralistic democracy, the exclusion of foreign bases or advisers and full respect for human rights";

8. Rejects any economic and military assistance which has as its objective aggression against or destabilization of States in the region.

Mr. STAFFORD. Second, the drafting committee for the economic questions, particularly involving those of the health and wellbeing of the elderly, on which Mr. STOKES served, was also able to formulate a resolution which was unanimously accepted by the full economic committee and then unanimously adopted by the entire conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Much good work was done there by Mr. STOKES.

The chairman of the House delegation, Mr. CLAUDE PEPPER, was unable to attend the conference because of a minor illness. I think he should be gratified to know that his hope that the economic committee might create an ad hoc committee with respect to the problems of the elderly was granted by that committee. The ad hoc committee under the economic committee is coming into existence just as Congressman PEPPER had hoped it might.

Mr. President, I ask unanimouns consent that that resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

75TH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE, MEXICO CITY, 7-12 APRIL 1986

ITEM 4

(The contribution of Parliaments to the acceleration of the economic advancement of developing countries by the improvement in the terms of international trade and by using science and technology to advance the welfare of mankind in general and, in particular, the health and well-being of the elderly.)

DRAFT RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, CULTURAL AND ENVIRONMENTAL QUESTIONS BY 31 VOTES TO 0 AND 2 ABSTENTIONS

(Rapporteur: Mr. M. Borge Martin (Mexico))

The 75th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recognizing that the Governments and Parliaments of developing and industrialized countries alike have a shared responsibility in fostering constructive international economic co-operation with a view to strengthening the global economy and advancing the welfare of mankind,

Emphasizing the important role which Parliaments can play in creating a greater public awareness of the fact that the fate of the countries of the North is intimately bound up wih the fate of the countries of the South,

Aware of the continuing threats to the global economy caused by economic stagnation in many countries, particularly in the Third World, their growing external debt burden, high unemployment rates aggravated by unstable or falling commodity prices, increasing protectionist pressures and international monetary instability,

Confirming the views contained in the resolutions of the 73rd and 74th Inter-Parliamentary Conferences on "The role of Parliaments and their contribution toward the elimination of poverty by alleviating the burden of international debt" and "The contribution of Parliaments to the search for measures and actions aimed at removing the burden of foreign debt that weighs on the developing countries",

Considering that in conditions characterized by unbalanced and unstable economic deveopment in the world, the causes of which lie in the structural disproportions and rigidities of the world economy, the burden of adjustment is unevenly distributed and lies primarily on the shoulders of the developing countries, thus jeopardizing their normal economic progress, in particular that of the least developed among them whose position is continuing to deteriorate,

Considering that, even in conditions of economic recovery in the developed countries, the position of the developing countries is not improving and is particularly influenced by growing protectionism, lower prices of raw materials, less favorable terms of trade, great exchange rate fluctuations, high real interest rates, a growing debt burden, and the reduction of official development assistance in real terms,

Considering that development policies should give greater priority to the development of human resources, to the reduction of illiteracy, to the integration of women in the development process, and to health, nutrition and population policies with a view to strengthening self-reliant and self-sustaining socio-economic development,

Emphasizing the importance of technical assistance as an often neglected but critical component of development co-operation and the indispensability of education and the expansion of human skills for the effective use of capital investment and for self-reliance,

Deeply concerned by the fact that a large share of mankind—especially in sub-Saharan Africa—is suffering from starvation and under-nourishment, resulting in an appalling human tragedy, life-long impairment to the health of children in particular and the uprooting of entire populations,

Recalling UN General Assembly resolution 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974 which acknowledges that the developing countries have the right to benefit from the advantages of science and technology to accelerate their economic and social development,

Recalling UN General Assembly resolution 37/207 entitled "Development aspects of the reverse transfer of technology" as well as the Conclusions and Recommendations of the Meeting of Governmental Experts on Reverse Transfer of Technology, adopted on 7 September 1983,

Convinced that the application of science and the continuing transfer of technology on acceptable terms are essential for raising the people's standard of living and improving the quality of life in the Third World and for ensuring better access to world markets for their products,

Recognizing the importance of co-operation between Parliaments of developed and developing countries in exchanging their perceptions and experiences in addressing the socio-economic issues surrounding the health and well-being of the elderly,

Recalling the endorsement by the world community of the International Plan of Action on Aging adopted at the World Assembly on Aging, held in Vienna from 26 July to 6 August 1982, and recognizing that the Plan of Action should be considered an integral component of the major international, regional and national strategies and programmes formulated in response to important world social and economic problems and needs,

Recalling further the resolutions on aging passed by the United Nations General Assembly at successive recent sessions (in particular resolution 40/30 of 29 November 1985 on the implementation of the International Plan of Action on Aging),

1. Supports the efforts made by the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies in favour of the drought-stricken areas in Africa, and calls on countries which are in a position to do so to increase their contributions to the Emergency Operations conducted under the responsibility of the Secretary-General of the United Nations as well as to the Special Programme and Facility for sub-Saharan Africa of the World Bank;

2. Invites the Governments and Parliaments of the industrialized nations:

(a) To improve further their generalized systems of preferences or most-favoured-nation treatment for products of particular importance to developing countries;

(b) To take measures to eliminate protectionism and discrimination in international trade, as well as other measures which do not obstruct or prevent exports from the developing countries under equitable conditions;

(c) To strengthen co-operation with developing countries in the field of trade promotion and to refrain from subsidizing exports, especially those of an agricultural nature competing with the exports of developing countries and also of other manufactured and semi-manufactured goods, including textiles and clothing;

(d) To help the developing countries to improve the quality and increase the production of various commodities, by means of the transfer of technology, as well as by raising the standard of living in these countries;

(e) To work for the stabilization and increase of revenues from commodities by adopting constructive attitudes in the negotiations on international commodity agreements, by promoting the speedy implementation of the integrated programme and the Common Fund for Commodities of UNCTAD, and by working for the strengthening of such international mechanisms as the Compensatory Financing Facility of the IMF;

(f) To adopt an overall strategy for co-operation designed to deal jointly with trade, debt and financing problems, conceived with a view to finding a lasting and stable solution that will assure the growth of the developing economies;

3. Calls upon the Governments and Parliaments of the GATT member countries to exert efforts in relation to the new multilateral trade negotiations within the framework of GATT with a view to the following:

(a) The provision and effective application in all fields of negotiations of the principle of a differentiated and more favourable treatment of the developing countries, including the non-reciprocity on their part for concessions given to them by the developed countries;

(b) The giving of priority in the negotiations to the unsolved problems from the Tokyo Round, mentioned in the 1982 GATT work programme, especially the seeking of solutions for the long-term open problem of a safeguard system based on GATT rules which should be applied in all sectors of international trade;

4. Considers that the World Bank should have a greater capacity to finance development projects so as to keep pace with expansion, needs and opportunities in the developing countries and, for this purpose, invites all Governments to support an increased lending capacity for the World Bank by means of a substantial capital increase;

5. Calls upon the industrialized countries to make a joint effort to provide the International Development Association with a total replenishment of $12 billion and to support the regional development banks so that they may pursue and expand their important role in the social and economic development of Africa, Asia and Latin America;

6. Recommends that the IMF become more effective through access to increased resources and a more flexible, varied and sensitive approach to the policy advice it gives to Governments of developing countries, giving greater weight to output, growth and employment as well as to the control of inflation and payment deficits;

7. Stresses the importance and urgency of reform in the international monetary system and, in this context, draws attention to the proposal of the Non-Aligned Summit of 1983 for the convening of an International Conference on Money and Finance for Development at an early stage;

8. Calls upon the IMF and other creditors to adopt a system for the repayment of foreign debts by developing countries which takes into consideration the balance of payments and the economic growth of the debtor as well as the resolutions adopted by the "Consensus of Cartagena";

9. Urges all States to work towards the full implementation of the World Plan of Action for the Application of Science and Technology to Development and of the Lagos Plan;

10. Calls upon industrialized countries:

(a) To ensure that developing countries have access to objective and unbiased sources of technical assistance and industrial co-operation geared to their particular needs and, to this end, to sustain the United Nations Development Programme [UNDP] and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization [UNIDO] as central organs of the United Nations system for technical and industrial co-operation;

(b) To help developing countries to strengthen their own capacity in the fields of training and scientific and technical research;

(c) To co-operate with developing countries in using advanced technologies, notably in agriculture, energy and space (for earth observation and resource management);

11. Calls upon developing countries:

(a) To strengthen their efforts to implement scientific and technological policies and to apply science and technology to research and development;

(b) To develop and popularize the use of scientific and technological processes suited to their circumstances and to increase innovation in this area, so as to accelerate their economic and social progress;

(c) To develop effectively North-South co-operation, in particular in relation to science, technology and trade;

12. Urges Parliaments and Governments to adopt constructive attitudes in relation to the preparation by the United Nations of an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology and of a Code of Conduct on Transnational Corporations, with a view to the speedy completion of the formulation of these codes;

13. Calls on Parliaments and Governments:

(a) To ensure that the question of aging is incorporated into their countries' national development plans, in accordance with their culture and traditions;

(b) To continue to make efforts to implement the principles and recommendations contained in the Vienna International Plan of Action on Aging;

(c) To continue to promote the exchange of information and experience in order to stimulate progress on the question of aging, to encourage the adoption of measures to respond to the economic and social implications of aging and to meet the needs of older persons;

(d) To consider convening regional and sub-regional meetings on the applicability of the recommendations of the International Plan of Aging to their particular needs and conditions;

14. Recommends that the Inter-Parliamentary Council establish, in accordance with Article 22(f) of the Statutes, a representative ad hoc committee to meet at each of the subsequent sessions to consider and report on steps Parliaments may take to improve the health and well-being of the elderly;

15. Recommends that both developing and developed countries launch, within an appropriate framework and in a spirit of solidarity and understanding, new North-South negotiations with a view to reforming the international trade system and to establishing a new international economic order which is more just and better balanced in accordance with the principles laid down in the programme of action adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1974.

Mr. STAFFORD. Finally, Mr. President, the second resolution which was produced in the political committee by another drafting group was adopted by the conference, but neither Mr. STOKES nor myself was able to serve on it because there were but two of us there trying to do the work normally carried on by five or six Members of the U.S. Congress.

I would have to say that even had we been there, the resolution probably would not have been satisfactory from the standpoint of the United States. We voted against it, but it was adopted. So that any Member of the Senate who might wish to examine it may see it, I ask unanimous consent that it also may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

75TH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE, MEXICO CITY, 7-12 APRIL 1986

(The implementation of the resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council and by the Inter-Parliamentary Union on the Palestinian Question, Lebanon, the occupied Arab territories, and the Iraq-Iran War, as a means of strengthening international peace and security.)

Draft resolution adopted by the Committee on political questions, international security and disarmament by 30 votes to 7, with 1 abstention.

Rapporteur: Mr. H. Van Wambeke (Belgium).

The 75th Inter-Parliamentary Conference—

Recalling all the relevant resolutions adopted by the UN General Assembly and Security Council and the Inter-Parliamentary Union;

Recalling also the statements and efforts of the Security Council and the Secretary-General of the United Nations;

Convinced that a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of conflicts can only be achieved by collective efforts, with the participation of all those concerned;

Convinced that continued occupation of Arab territories by Israel and the denial of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to return to their homeland and to self-determination, constitute the most serious problem in the Middle East yet to be resolved,

Recognizing the rights of all States in the region to existence and security, as well as the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to return to their homeland and to self-determination,

Noting that Israel has not, to date, complied with UN Security Council resolutions 425 and 426 (1978), 501, 508 and 509 (1982) concerning Lebanon, and is stubbornly insisting on maintaining a military presence, directly through the stationing of troops and indirectly through allied armed groups on the pretext of protecting its security, and, stressing that Israel has failed to achieve this aim and has on the contrary only maintained and exacerbated tension in South Lebanon, added legitimacy to the national resistance and inflamed the internal situation in Lebanon in spite of the universal desire for the elimination of the hotbed of tension in the Middle East and for the return of peace, security and sovereignty to Lebanon,

Regretting the decision by the US Congress to cut back by half the US contribution to the funding of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), and noting that the decisions of a military, political and financial nature which might hinder UNIFIL's mission may discourage the States which are participating in UNIFIL in their humanitarian and pacific mission, thereby leading to a worsening of the situation in the area,

Deploring the initial acts which gave rise to the conflict between Iran and Iraq and expressing deep regret and concern at the continuation of the conflict, which causes great human and material loss for both countries, destabilizes the security of and disrupts navigation in the region,

Profoundly concerned by numerous UN reports of violations of international humanitarian law and in particular the 17 June 1925 Geneva Protocol regarding the use of chemical weapons and the 12 August 1949 Geneva Convention for the protection of war victims,

A. As regards the Middle East—

1. Calls again for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East;

8. Hopes that the member states of the UN Security Council will accept once again Lebanon's request for the renewal of the mandate of UNIFIL, which is set for 17 April 1986, and that the US Congress will reverse its decision to reduce by half the US share in the funding of UNIFIL;

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, with only two of us there, it was particularly difficult for Mr. STOKES and myself to cover all the various duties that fall upon a U.S. delegation at a meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. The Inter-Parliamentary Union can be distinguished from the United Nations because a country, to belong, has to have at least some kind of parliamentary organization to get there. So the union is made up of members of parliaments rather than diplomats. There is always the possibility that parliamentarians, after a meeting of this kind, can return to their countries and adopt some legislation reflecting the efforts of the conference itself.

It affords a great opportunity for members of parliaments of the world to know something about each other and frequently, if you go to a few of the sessions, to get on a first-name basis with delegates from another part of the world.

It is also, in my opinion, after having served on our delegation for most of 14 years, an unusual opportunity to get a realistic appraisal of how much of the rest of the world reacts to the United States. Anybody who wants to really understand how the rest of the world feels about us and how we can impact on the rest of the world, in my opinion, ought to make a couple of trips with an IPU delegation and experience this firsthand instead of reading about it in the press or hearing about it on the electronic media. It is quite an experience. To some of us from time to time, it may come as something of a shock.

Mr. STOKES and I could not have possibly carried out as much work as we did in Mexico City had it not been for the outstanding work of some of the professional staff that were with us. I have particular reference to Mr. Claude Allen, who is from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Ryan Malarkey, professional staff member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Marty Sletzinger, staff consultant to the House

Foreign Affairs Committee, and Mr. Ernest Grigg from the State Department.

Those men worked above and beyond the call of duty, night after night as well as through long days, to help Mr. STOKES and myself on the various duties we were carrying out, particularly the drafting of the resolutions in which we played a part.

Mr. Edward Derwinski, counselor at the Department of State, former Member of Congress, was particularly helpful at all times. Of special help to Mr. STOKES and myself was Robert McClory, former Member of Congress, who is an honorary member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union from the United States. In view of his long service in that body he was invaluable.

I have not mentioned others of the staff, but there were many who worked hard to see that we were able to carry out the job assigned to us and, over 6 hard days, get as much done that was favorable to the United States as we could.

Mr. President, I hope that when we make another trip—I might point out that there will be a meeting of the Inter-parliamentary Union in Argentina, in Buenos Aires, on the 6th to 11th of October 1986 That will be the 76th Inter-Parliamentary Conference. The two committees that will be meeting at that time will be the Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights questions, and the subject will be the contribution of parliaments to the application and progress of humanitarian international law applicable in cases of armed conflict.

The other is the Committee on Non-self Governing Territories and Ethnic questions. The subject will be the contribution of parliaments to the elimination of the remnants of colonialism in the world, in particular to promoting the independence of the media and the eradication of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa and to pursuing the political, economic, and social advancement and peaceful development of the so-called small territories.

It is my earnest hope that this body would be willing to have some additional members to the Senator from Vermont attend that particular meeting. We shall have to defend ourselves on that second committee from the usual charges, I might say, that we are a neocolonial power. We hope we will have enough Members going to what should be an interesting place so that there will be enough to cover the various subjects that have to be taken care of. That again is Buenos Aires, October 6 to 11 of 1986. We will correspond with our colleagues further and hope some people will be interested.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the floor.

EUROPEAN COOPERATION IN THE STRUGGLE AGAINST LIBYAN TERRORISM

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, with the notable exception of the United Kingdom, under the steady leadership of Prime Minister Thatcher, most of our European NATO allies have indeed flinced in the face of terrorism.

As former Secretary of State Kissinger said recently, we all recognize that Sovereign states often disagree, even when they are allies. But it is inconceivable that our European allies should disagree with us 100 percent of the time, and still except to be treated as allies. Is there any step the United States could have taken against the terrorist nests in Libya that would have escaped the opposition of France and Italy?

In the case of France, a nation which is not shy about defending its interests in Africa or the South Pacific though any and all means availble, I am at a loss to understand their motivation. French airmen have frequently gone into combat against Colonel Qadhafi's forces in the country of Chad. This has happened in the past few months. French peacekeeping troops in Lebanon have been killed by Lebanese forces paid by Qadhafi and the Iranians. French citizens have been killed on French soil by terrorists allied with Qadhafi.

Just presently, we learned that Qadhafi's terrorists planned a daytime grenade and machine-gun attack on the American Embassy visa office in Paris. That could have killed dozens of people. The terrorists would not, in this insance, have been killing Americans. Americans don't need to stand in line for visas in Paris. The Qadhafi terrorists would have been killing Frenchmen and Frenchwomen. We stopped that.

What were the consequences of the French refusal to allow our F111's to overfly France, and reduce their long journey by 1,200 miles? For one thing, it increased the flying time for our brave pilots and weapons officers by 6 or 7 hours. That meant 14 hours sitting in confined space, unable to stretch or rest. Some might say that is a fault of the design of the F111, but our 36 officers and our 18 aircraft would have been in much better shape—much fresher and able to perform their mission with accuracy and safety—if they had been able to overfly France. Perhaps the French embassy in Tripoli would have remained undamaged, and we regret the damage that did occur, if our American pilots had arrived less fatigued.

I also regret the strange behavior of Italy, the land of my own ancestors, in the matter of Qadhafi's terrorists. Italy has a special connection with Libya, a former colony. Thousands of Italians were born and raised in Libya between the two world wars. Under Qadhafi's rule of terror, many of them lost everything they owned and had built up over the years. Churches were closed, and the economy was ruined, requiring the importation of thousands of other foreign nationals. Unlike the Libyans of Italian ancestry, they had no stake in the country. Yet we never hear much about this self-destructive anti-Italian behavior. We just hear about how the Italians do not want to risk their current, rather transitory, investments and job opportunities in Libya.

Has the Italian prime minister forgotten the winter's events at the airport in Rome? The pictures of visitors to Italy slaughtered like sheep, and Italian citizens falling in the crossfire? Is this the same brave Italian government that rescued the American, General Frazier, from local terrorists several years ago? The same brave Italian government that brought under control the Red Brigades which killed former Prime Minister Moro, one of the great western statesmen of the post-war period? The same Italian government whose judges fearlessly probe into international criminal groups and local mobsters? There is no question that Italy is on the front line already in the fight against terrorism, yet the Italian government will not agree to joint sanctions against Qadhafi's economy.

Mr. President, I should like to express our appreciation to the British people for their cooperation, and respectfully request the French and Italians reconsider their refusal to cooperate in the struggle against Qadhafi.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THATCHER SUPPORT OF U.S. ACTION

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I should like to express my appreciation to Margaret Thatcher and her government for the support they have given the United States in this situation in Europe. I have been listening to a lot of criticism by our European allies, but there is one exception to all of that, the Government of Great Britain. Margaret Thatcher deserves the support and the commendation of everybody in this Senate who has supported the action of the United States. But for what she did, those F-111's of course could not have taken off from Lakenheath.

Mr. President, I know it has been a great political cost to her and to her government; her government has suffered some setbacks recently, particularly in an election that just took place and yet she went out on the end of a limb. It was not necessary for her to do this. Nobody else amongst our European allies was supporting what we did. I want to tip my hat to Margaret Thatcher and to her government. I think it is wonderful that we have an ally that really is an ally, and it was not in her particular interest, clearly it was against her political interests to support us as she did.

Mr. President, we are fortunate to have as loyal a person as Margaret Thatcher as head of the Government of the United Kingdom, and we want to pay tribute and our respect to her for what she did.

CREDIT AGAINST INCOME TAX FOR B-STOCK LOSSES

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would provide farmers who suffered the loss of their B-stock due to the failure of production credit associations a fair shake under the tax laws. This bill would give those farmers the option of taking a tax credit for their payments for worthless B-stock.

The Farm Credit System accounts for about 32 percent of all farm debt in 1985. Organized through Federal land banks and production credit associations [PCA's], the Farm Credit System has helped provide millions of farmers the financial resources they must have to produce a crop. Production credit associations are cooperatively organized lending institutions wholly owned by its member borrowers, operating under Federal law and regulated by the Farm Credit Administration.

In order to borrow from a PCA, the borrower must acquire stock in the system, and this stock becomes part of the loan package. An amount equal to 10 percent of the loan disbursement becomes a contingent stock liability to the PCA. If the PCA remained solvent for the life of the loan, the liability for B-stock would be retired or canceled as the loan was repaid.

During the early 1980's, loan officers at PCA's usually referred to B-stock as a simple formality in securing a loan. Farmers were told that it was a small percentage of the loan package and that no one had ever been called on to pay off the B-stock portion of their loan—it was required by Federal law, but nothing to be concerned about.

In recent years, however, PCA's have faced increasing problems with their borrowers experiencing serious debt repayment problems and increasing levels of loan losses. Thirty-nine PCA's that experienced large losses or other problems were merged with neighboring PCA's during the January–September 1984 period. The passage of the Farm Credit Amendments Act of 1985, Public Law 99-205, will protect the B-stock investment of the farmers who are a part of these merged PCA's and help troubled PCA's from being forced into liquidation.

Congressional action came too late, however, for PCA's. Prior to enactment of the Farm Credit Amendments Act, these 11 PCA's were forced to liquidate as a result of severe loan losses. The farmers who put their trust in the Farm Credit System by taking out loans from these PCA's are the unwitting losers in our legislative relief package. They have had the bad luck of having their PCA close too soon, before Congress stepped in to protect the system. As a result, they are having to make payments on worthless B-stock as they pay off their loans. This is simply unfair.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today is a small step in correcting the unfairness of this situation. It gives the farmer the option of taking a tax credit for the amount that he or she is paying or paid for B-stock that has been made worthless due to the failure of a PCA. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reprinted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2313

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

S. 2315. A bill to provide for the restructuring of agricultural loans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT

Mr. CRANSTON: Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that provides for principal and/or interest payment buy downs on agricultural loans held by farm borrowers that can demonstrate a reasonable possibility of repayment. Under the program the Federal Government, the State government if it chooses to participate, and the lender would share the cost of reducing the debt service on an agricultural loan to an amount the borrower is capable of managing. This amendment is designed to help the small- and medium-size farmer.

The three bank regulatory agencies recently proposed modifications in the bank accounting rules to allow banks more flexibility to deal with losses incurred from troubled farm and energy loans similar to the language in the pending bill. While this action is a step in the right direction and gives relief primarily to banks, I am concerned that there is no mechanism to encourage banks to restructure loans deeply enough and stretch out the debt burden of farmers who have a reasonable possibility of returning to profitability if their monthly debt burben is reduced. Under the pending agricultural bill S. 2231, flexible loan restructuring is permitted for banks that meet the definition of an "agricultural bank"—those that have 25 percent or more of their portfolio in agricultural loans and their capital is impaired—while, other nonagricultural banks could apply only on a case-by-case basis. California banks hold about 9 percent of the agricultural loans nationwide—more than any other State. None is defined as an agricultural bank.

Under this program the principal and interest rate reductions on restructured loans would be accomplished by the lender reducing the amount of the loan principal by 10 percent or more with the Federal and/or State government each contributing a matching 2 percent subsidy on interest write downs.

My goal is to develop a debt restructuring plan to aid financially stressed farmers who would, under the right circumstances, have a chance to survive. Farm operators with the greatest debt problems have substantial amounts of nonworking debt which after the servicing of principal and interest leaves little cash-flow available to continue to operate the farm business. For these farmers a substantial reduction in the debt that has to be serviced out of current income is absolutely the only way to bring about long-lasting financial relief.

Commercial banks currently face substantial regulatory impediments if they want to help farm operators with debt restructuring. Any debt that makes a portion of the loan a nonearning asset for the bank results in a nonearning portion of the loan immediately being written off against capital, even if the loan could be repaid in the future. Banks are also under pressure to require that loans be fully collateralized while at the same time collateral values securing existing loans continue to devalue causing the farm debt to escalate.

While this bill and other regulations recently issued have liberalized bank lending and forebearance ability, these liberalized lending and restructuring requirements do not apply to many large banks that have enormous portfolios of agricultural loans which do not meet the agricultural bank definition in S. 2231 of having 25 percent or more farm loans. For instance five large banks in California hold 88 percent of the commercial bank agricultural loans in California, yet these banks are not qualified as agricultural banks because of their size even though they may hold more agricultural loans than an average size agricultural bank that specializes in only farm loans. They have no program under which to provide liberalized loan relief for their farm borrowers.

Heretofore, most programs have encouraged banks to work out strategies with their farm borrowers, knowing that lenders experiencing difficulties would have a difficult time participating because of capital impairment problems. However, in this program, direct financial assistance will be provided to the farm borrower to encourage the lenders to participate actively in restructuring farm debt. The expansion of the $490 million interest rate buydown program in the 1985 farm bill to include funding for the interest subsidy in this bill will provide much needed cash-flow assistance to agricultural borrowers at no additional cost to the Government.

A recent analysis by the Congressional Budget Office indicates that this interest rate subsidy program will not cost over $35 million in 1986 and no more than $210 million a year over 3 years.

The Congress has previously passed legislation, S. 1844, the Farm Credit System Restructuring and Regulatory Relief Act of 1985, that ameliorates the financial pressures on the Farm Credit System borrowers. Equal benefits should be available to nonfarm credit system borrowers.

The pressures on the farm economy are not expected to change significantly in the near future. However, most individual farm operators continue to show reasonable levels of cash-flow and income, nonetheless, the problems are immediate and serious for producers who sharply increased their debt during the high profit period in the late 1970's and others who have been borrowing extensively in recent years to ride out what was expected to be a brief period of low profits. Because many outside factors contributed to the seriousness of the problem and because communities and financial institutions may be seriously impaired as well as farmers, the solution calls for some type of Government assistance that can stabilize land values, and provide a targeted program of debt restructuring because:

First, 55 percent of the farms with negative margins—232,046—would not have had negative cash-flow except for debt service on which a debt restructuring program could have a significant impact on their chances of survival, according to a study done by the Center for National Policy.

Second, the farmers are rushing to sell land to pay current debts; further depressing land prices at the same time lenders rush to market to sell foreclosed property. The bill provides for an extension of the 5-year real estate holding period by banks. This will permit banks to hold foreclosed properties up to 10 years. Hopefully, this will slow down bank sales on farm properties and help to stabilize farm land values.

Third, in the Senate bill, S. 2231, emphasis has been placed on stabilizing the capital base of lending institutions and finding mechanisms for doing so which permit loan losses to continue to be realized. The primary objective of these approaches is to prevent deterioration of the financial system.

Stretching out loans, whether accompanied by lower interest are not, reduces the value of the lenders asset—collateral. Forebearance in loan service treatment cannot continue indefinitely without jeopardizing either the lenders interest or the borrowers solvency. Further, for some borrowers, relief which reasonably might be provided by the lender is not adequate to allow them to achieve a stable cash-flow position over time.

According to the American Farm Bureau Federation in testimony before the Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee on March 11, 1986:

> For 1986, the agricultural finance policy debate will be focused on the immediate problems of the one-third of commercial agricultural operators that hold two-thirds of the debt held by farm operators. About half of this group, 100,000 to 125,000 farm operators, are at the point where substantial debt restructuring will be needed over the next two years to avoid liquidation, either voluntary or forced.
> A substantial reduction in debt loan or a reduction in the debt that has to be serviced out of current income is absolutely essential. Only this will bring long-lasting financial relief to stressed farm operators.

Recent reports from California, the Nation's leading agricultural State, indicate that farmers there are in worse trouble than previously recognized.

According to one estimate, 15 percent of California's 135,000 full-time farmers are in serious trouble and nearly 10 percent more are having difficulty in making payments on their debts.

According to Jim Cothern, agricultural economist in charge of the farm crisis project in California, California farmers owed more than $9 billion in real estate loans in 1984. In 1986 their debt is expected to exceed $10 billion.

In 1984 California farmers owed $8.5 billion in nonreal estate loans. This will top $10 billion in 1986 for a combined debt of $20 billion in 1986.

Clair Berryhill, director of the California Department of Food and Agriculture, and Henry Voss, president of the California Farm Bureau, also predict that 25 percent of the farms in California will go out of business in the near future.

The San Franciso examiner reports that as many as 33 percent of California farm borrowers have net worths that have slipped below zero.

Bank of America and Wells Fargo Bank, according to the examiner, have foreclosed or accepted voluntary take backs on property worth more than $210 million.

While California net farm income held between $2 and $4 billion from 1977 to 1984, total farm debt in the State rose from $8 billion to nearly $18 billion.

The Bank of America last year reported agricultural loan losses of $150 million. The bank's loan loss ratio, the average outstanding loans divided into the loss amount, was 9.42 percent. According to Cornelius Gallagher, vice president for agribusiness at the bank, this is probably five times as high as the Midwest and at least two times as high as the Midwest.

With commercial banks providing 50 percent of the agricultural loans in the State, this is an alarming situation.

A program providing incentives for restructuring such as my bill is a realistic approach to turning the debt problem around, for farmers and stabilizing farm debt so fewer farmers will be forced out of business and banks will benefit from stronger loan portfolios.

There is a growing public concern about the viability of the family farm. The adjustment process to deflation in agriculture has weakened some farmers and banks and also the communities they serve. These farmers and banks and their surrounding communities can be expected to survive, but only if they are given more time to adjust to the massive changes now going on in agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the full text of my bill and section-by-section printed in the RECORD and several select news articles on the plight of farmers in California.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2315

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Credit Act of 1986".

TITLE I—DEFERRALS

SEC. 101. IN GENERAL.

(a) REQUIREMENTS FOR RECEIVING PAYMENTS.—If a qualified lender agrees to defer principal or interest payments under this title with respect to an agricultural loan to a qualified borrower, the Secretary, and appropriate State authorities (if so authorized under State law), shall make payments to that lender as described in section 102.

(b) LIMITATION ON LOAN AMOUNTS.—A deferral of principal and interest payments under this title may be made only with respect to loan amounts of a borrower totaling, in the aggregate, not more than—

(1) $500,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is an individual; and

(2) $700,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is a person other than an individual.

(c) PERIOD FOR INITIATING REFERRALS OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST.—

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), a deferral of principal and interest payments under this title may be made only within 90 days after the lender has received an application for such deferral submitted by the borrower within one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to a deferral of principal and interest payments made during the period beginning six months before the date of enactment of this Act and ending on the date of enactment.

SEC. 102. STATE AND FEDERAL INTEREST RATE PAYMENTS.

(a) PAYMENTS BY THE SECRETARY.—If the lender defers the principal or interest accruing on a loan throughout the period that an interest deferral remains in effect under section 104(a) by (1) 2 percent of the interest and 10 percent of the principal; (2) 1 percent of the interest and 15 percent of the principal; or (3) 20 percent or more of the principal, the Secretary, through the Farmers Home Administration, shall pay to the qualified lender making a deferral of principal and interest under section 103—

(1) an amount equal to the amount of the deferral by the lender but not to exceed 2 percentage points of the interest accruing on such loan throughout the period that an interest deferral remains in effect under section 104(a); and

(2) any amount received by the Secretary under subsection (b).

Any payment under this subsection shall be passed on to the borrower.

(b) PAYMENTS BY APPROPRIATE STATE AUTHORITIES.—With respect to a loan for which a deferral of principal or interest is made under section 104, the appropriate State authorities (if so authorized under State law), shall pay to the Secretary an amount equal to 2 percentage points of the interest accruing on such loan throughout the period that such deferral remains in effect under section 104(a).

(b) EXCEPTION IN THE CASE OF FIXED RATE LOANS.—In lieu of a principal deferral described under the second column of the table in subsection (a), a lender may defer the interest on a loan by an amount which will yield loan payments by the borrower comparable to loan payments which would be due under such principal deferral. An interest rate deferral under this subsection shall be in addition to any interest rate deferral described in the table in subsection (a).

SEC. 104. DEFERRAL PERIOD.

(a) DURATION OF INTEREST RATE DEFERRALS.—Except as provided in subsection (c), interest rate deferrals made under section 103 shall be in effect for the duration of the loan or for a period of three years from the date of enactment of this Act, whichever is less.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT OF 1986—SECTION-BY-SECTION

TITLE I: PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST SUBSIDY DEFERRAL

Section 101: General Provisions

To encourage farm debt restructuring, this Act provides a matching interest subsidy program to lenders that reduce principal on troubled farm loans by at least 10 percent. As an added benefit, such debt restructuring would also allow lenders to participate in FmHA's Debt Adjustment Program (DAP). Under the DAP, loans that are restructured by at least 10 percent are eligible for a 90 percent FmHA guarantee.

From the date the Act is enacted, borrowers have a one-year period in which they can apply to their lenders to participate in this three-year program. Loans that lenders have restructured during a six month period prior to enactment of this act would also be eligible for the interest subsidy. Qualifying individual borrowers debt cannot exceed $500,000, other than an individual qualified debt can't exceed $700,000.

Section 102: State and Federal Interest Rate Payments

Interest rate subsidies would be provided to qualified lenders through the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA). State participation is optional.

Section 103: Principal and Interest Rate Deferral

Up to 6 points of interest could be written down for those loans in which principal is reduced by at least 10 percent. The interest subsidy consists of 2 percent Federal, 2 percent State (participation is optional), and 2 percent Lender.

[In percent]

Principal reduction [1]	Interest subsidy contribution			Total interest write-down
	Federal	State [2]	Lender
10 [3]
15	2	2	2	6
15	2	2	1	5
20 or more	2	2	0	4

[1] In lieu of a principal reduction, lenders could reduce interest on loans to achieve a comparable payment reduction over the life of the loan.
[2] State participation is optional. If State does not participate, total interest write-down would be reduced by 2 percent.
[3] Qualifies for 90 percent FmHA Guarantees under DAP.

Section 104: Duration of Interest Rate Deferral

At the end of this 3 year program, the interest rate charged on the restructured loan cannot exceed the standard rate charged by the lender for a comparable loan.

Section 105: Recapture Provision

In the event of non-monetary default (violation of non-monetary terms of loan agreement without lenders' consent), the lender may enforce the terms of the loan as they existed before restructuring occurred.

Section 106: Development of Guidelines

(a) Requires lender to develop debt restructuring guidelines for farm borrowers.

(b) If a lender should foreclose on a participating borrower, the federal and state interest subsidy would be cancelled.

Section 107: Use of Certain Funds

Authorizes the Secretary to use the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund to carry out this Act. Provides the Secretary with discretionary authority to use funds authorized in FY86, FY87, FY88, and FY89 under the interest subsidy program in the Farm Bill. Section 309, 203(u)(1) Section 351(e)(2) of the consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act.

Section 108: Guidelines

Authorizes the Secretary to issue regulations to implement this Act within 30 days after the date of enactment.

Section 109: Limitations on State Laws

This section clarifies that the requirement for fixed rate mortgages in any restructured loan supersedes any state law.

Section 110: Penalty for Misuse of Funds

Provides for penalties under 18 U.S.C. 3623 or imprisonment for up to five years for those who steal, forge, misapply, etc., under this act.

Section 111: Definitions

"Agricultural Loan"—any loan made to finance production of agricultural products or livestock; or secured by agricultural property.

"Debt Restructuring"—loans restructured by any combination of: repayment period extenstion, interest rate reduction, principal reduction, or asset restructuring that would be accomplished over a ten year period.

"Qualified Agricultural Debt"—borrowers are limited to a $500,000 aggregate loan participation in the case of an individual and $600,000 in all other agricultural operations.

"Qualified Borrower":

Is any person that has made at least 50 percent of its gross income from farming in four of the past five years;

Has gross annual sales of at least $30,000 during three of the previous three years, and total net income not to exceed $100,000;

Is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest on agricultural loan;

Can demonstrate an ability to repay loan if debt is restructured.

"Qualified Lender"—any commercial bank, savings and loan association, credit union, insurance company, or farm credit institution.

"Qualified State Institution"—any State chartered depository institution that has deposits insured or guaranteed under State law.

TITLE II: CONSERVATION PROVISIONS

Amends Section 1211 and 1212 of Food Security Act of 1985 to provide that any producer that cultivates highly erodible lands and wetlands will be ineligible for assistance under this Act.

TITLE III: ACCOUNTING PROVISIONS

Section 201: Federal Regulation of the Accounting for Restructured Agricultural Loans

Subsections (k)(1 thru 5) Agricultural Loan Restructuring

Amends the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide lenders with more flexibility to restructure troubled agricultural debt—by minimizing effects of capital erosion and lending limitations. The following amendments are consistent with those proposed by the bank regulatory agencies in March, 1986 and in S. 2231.

(A) FASB #15—encourages banks to utilize a little-used accounting rule that allows banks to restructure loans without having to take a loss against capital if the restructuring results in payments that at least equal the original loan principal. FASB #15 (Financial Accounting Standards Board Statement No. 15) applies when "the creditor's objective is to make the best of a difficult situation . . . the creditor expects to obtain more . . . value from the debtor, or to increase the probability of receipt, by granting the concession than by not granting it."

(B) Capital Forbearance—requires each Federal banking agency to establish a capital forbearance program for banks that have experienced a reduction in capital which is largely attributable to problems in the agriculture sector. Under such a program, a bank would be allowed to operate under relaxed capital requirements, provided they can demonstrate capacity to restore capital within five years. Currently, banks falling below the minimum 6% capital level are subject to stringent enforcement action by bank examiners.

(C) "Call Report" Modifications—requires the Federal banking agencies to amend description of the status of restructured "troubled" loans in the Reports of Condition and Income (call reports). This requirement allows banks to distinguish loans that, although restructured (as under FASB #15), are in compliance with modified terms. Those loans would no longer need to be included in the category of nonperforming loans but could be disclosed in the call report as "Restructured and in Compliance with Modified Terms" or a similar description.

Subsection (k)(6) Guidelines

Requires participating lenders to restablish guidelines to determine which borrowers qualify for restructuring.

Subsection (k)(7) Recapture Provisions

In the event of non-monetary default (violation of non-monetary terms of loan agreement without lenders' consent), the lender may enforce the terms of the loan as they existed before restructuring occurred.

Subsection (k)(8) Definitions

With the exception that this Section only applies to banks that have their deposits insured by the FDIC, the definitions are basically the same as those listed under Section 212.

Section 302: Modification of Lending Limitations for Lenders That Restructure Agricultural Loans

Amends regulations that establish lending limits for national banks so that a temporary reduction in capital would not reduce banks' lending authority. Currently, a decline in capital results in a parallel decline in the bank's maximum lending limit. By establishing an increased lending limit, a bank participating in the capital forbearance program who suffers moderate losses on agricultural loans could maintain its current dollar lending limits.

Section 303: Regulation of the Accounting for Restructured Agricultural Loans by State Insured Depository Institutions

Requires appropriate State banking agency to amend State regulations to conform to amendments in Section 401.

Section 304: Real Estate Holding Period

Amends 12 U.S.C Section 29, which establishes the limited purposes for which national banks may purchase, hold and convey real property mortgaged, conveyed or otherwise acquired as security for or in satisfaction of a debt previously contracted. Currently, a bank must dispose of such property within five years unless the Comptroller of the Currency approves the possession for an extended period not to exceed an additional five years. This amendment would allow any national bank to hold such real property for a 10-year period without the Comptroller's approval. The amendment is intended to prevent further depressed farmland values which could result from agricultural banks' disposal of such real estate.

UNHAPPY BANKS REAP CROP OF UNPROFITABLE LAND

(By Sally Lehrman)

FRESNO.—The white banner draped outside the Bank of America branch office cheerily invites, "Have a loan!"

But farmers throughout the state wonder just who the bank is inviting. This winter, loyal bank customers are encountering a reception as cool as the weather, and often walking away without even the warmth of a promise.

Farmers already feeling the crush of plummeting land values, sinking commodities and swamped markets now must face their banker's stony countenance.

As in other farm states, California lenders are moving quickly to cut their losses, and shore up portfolios sagging under the weight of the agriculture industry's problems. Loaded with acres of acquired property, millions of dollars written off as losses and millions more not accruing interest, they are demanding hard proof of future payment, and cutting off customers who can't provide it.

Bank of America, Wells Fargo and Crocker Bank are taking back properties in numbers not seen since the Great Depression. Their reluctance to lend to operators who can't show a sure profit is forcing many more farmers to sell off their property or shut down the ranch. Strict rules enforced by checklists and computer work sheets often eliminate the good farmer who's not all that good at filling out forms.

"(Banks) started tightening up in the summer of '85," said Dan Buser, a former official at the American Bankers Association. "They had to.

"You don't want to keep extending, if you've got to foreclose; that's no fun," Buser said. "At the same time, you want to keep your customers. It's difficult."

Agricultural loan losses last year reached $150 million for Bank of America and $36.7 million for Wells Fargo, the state's two biggest farm lenders. In 1984, the two banks lost $82 million and $45.9 million, respectively, on farm loans. The 1985 total helped push Bank of America to a staggering $337 million overall loss for last year.

Bank of America reported $188 million in loans not accruing interest out of a total agriculture loan portfolio of $1.7 billion last year. Wells Fargo was unable to collect interest on loans worth $180 million out of a farm loan portfolio of $825 million. (The Wells Fargo portfolio includes loans made by Wells Fargo Ag Credit, a Colorado subsidiary.)

Cornelius Gallagher, vice president in charge of agribusiness for the Bank of America, calls the bank's agriculture loan losses "significant," even though the farm portion of the bank's portfolio is only about 3 percent of total loans. As banks toughen up on lending policies, some critics accuse them of pulling out of agriculture altogether. But Bank of America's investment in agriculture remains strong, even though it dropped from $2.1 billion in 1984 to $1.7 billion last year. Wells Fargo's loans to the industry increased slightly from $802 million in 1984.

Lenders assure farmers that they plan to stand by them. They are quick to add, however, that they must protect against their own losses.

"We're in a risk business," Gallagher said. "We have to manage that risk."

George Beitzel, executive vice president of the Farm Credit Banks of Sacramento, said the bank is still "making lots of agriculture loans every day. But we are scrutinizing loans, making sure there is a means to repay them and a constructive purpose to the loans."

Ken Billings, president of the Federal Land Bank in Fresno, said the farmer-owned farm credit system feels a special responsibility to growers.

"If they have a fighting chance at all, we'll keep the loan in default," Billings said. "If they can service the interest, we'll stay with them, even if they're one or two payments behind.

"If we can be criticized for anything, it's staying with them too long."

Wells Fargo and Bank of America officials also say they aren't asking farmers to turn their fortunes around overnight.

However, five months into the crop year, Lars Swanson still is begging for funding from First Interstate Bank and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Association. His commercial spray business has brought in just enough to barely maintain his 200 acres of alfalfa, walnuts and almonds in Los Banos—with a little left over to live on.

Water and taxes were due in December. Swanson (who asked that his real name not be used) has sold his house and his houseboat, and has tried to sell his ranch.

"We're already four months without living expenses," Swanson said recently, musing about his future while he watched an auction preview at his next-door neighbor's ranch. "Seems like every year they get slower."

Swanson went to FmHA, the farm lender of last resort, because his regular lender had decided to foreclose. He said his application has been at FmHA for eight months, and First Interstate won't sign a check for operating money until FmHA gives him the OK.

"I said to my banker, 'You get a guy down, then you keep kicking him and kicking him,'" he said. "Instead of helping, they're just tightening the screws harder."

Farmers also complain that as the crisis has grown, bankers have stopped making decisions on their own and instead are depending on manuals and check lists to make their choices.

City folks in pin-stripe suits are replacing the local banker who knew farming and knew his customers, they say. The loan officer who worked with families and their farms for years has been isolated to a special task force on problem loans, replaced by a newcomer with a computer.

Bank of America has a 20-point list it uses to evaluate farm loans. One wrong check and you're out of luck.

The loan gets bumped up to a higher authority and possibly into limbo. "Even the smallest loan is subject to the highest scrutiny," said Ronald Brase, president of Crop Care Services Inc., a consulting service in Fresno. Despite his excellent loan history, Brase recently had to wait nearly a month to get about $20,000 to grow Thompson grapes on his small family farm.

BofA's Gallagher defends the check list as a streamlined version of the same questions bankers always have asked. The bank's checklist asks for basic financial facts and a general business plan, he said. And with real estate values rapidly diminishing, banks that once would base hefty loans on the value of a farmer's land now are carefully examining the operation's cash flow.

"Back in the good old days, there were farmers who were so financially strong . . .

that you would loan to them without asking questions," Gallagher said. But things have changed. Farmers now find it nearly impossible to project a cash flow, because they have little ability to predict the cost of production or what a crop will bring in.

"We're just asking, 'How are you going to repay the loan?' " Gallagher said. "That's a very basic question. I'm sorry it's tougher to answer."

Flow charts and documentation have become just as vital as a good crop. Because Brase reported higher than average crop yields, he was required to bring in a land appraisal or receipts proving the delivery of his crop.

"Banks have been extremely stringent," he said—so stringent, he said, that they're forcing many good farmers to become marginal ones.

"You start cutting costs too much, you start hurting your income, that's what to a large extent is happening," he said. "In the last two or three months, because financing institutions have come down so hard on growers, I've seen several good growers move into a survival mode."

Farmers who have cut costs and improved production in the last couple of years may find lenders unmoved by their efforts, because the institutions usually base their decisions on a four-year average.

Most banks also are demanding that farms show a 25 percent profit margin. But, Brase said, "with current commodity prices, there ain't no one who can get that 25 percent margin."

While insisting that BofA holds no absolutes, Gallagher defends the concept of a wide profit margin. According to the bank's logic, farmers need a larger margin for error because it's so hard to predict how they will fare in today's constantly changing commodities market.

"We're just saying, balance your budget," he said. "But because of the uncertainty, you better have a margin there."

While banks say the more stringent paper work helps weed out poor managers, others argue that the strict guidelines eliminate both the innovator and the experienced grower who knows where his costs are, but not how to put them down on paper. The farmer who can grow an outstanding stand of wheat, but is flustered by a pile of forms won't get a loan.

"Many bankers are overly conservative in how they're viewing lending practices in agriculture," said Henry Voss, president of the California Farm Bureau Federation in Sacramento. "I think what will happen is some people who are good managers and probably have sufficient assets . . . will be questioned or denied credit because these people don't fit into that computer mold."

Gallagher said it is not the attitude of the banks that has changed—just the structure of agriculture. "The way you look at it hasn't changed—what's changed is what you're looking at," he said. Farmers are struggling to reduce their debt at the same time their asset value is falling sharply. They work to reduce costs, but can't keep up with dropping commodity prices. To survive, they need to be keenly aware of the marketplace and their own financial position, Gallagher said.

BofA, Wells Fargo and other banks stress their willingness to assist the farmer—to a point.

"We'll work with them and make suggestions in the financial area," said Billings. "We'll help them restructure their debt; make suggestions like don't buy new equipment, instead pay a little higher repair bill.

"But most farmers are good farmers, you don't need to advise them how to farm."

Billings said the Land Bank has increased its staff by 20 percent in the last year to work with problem loans.

Wells Fargo's James Kirk said most of the farmers who have been able to survive are good farmers. "The farmer who's not the great manager may not have lasted this long anyway," he said. So Wells Fargo tries to structure a program that will help them stay in business.

Banks are shutting the door on scores of marginal businessmen.

"Ultimately, the solution is not to throw money, continually year after year, at a losing situation," said Roger Cruzen, a spokesman for Wells Fargo.

Bank of America recently isolated many of its problem loans into "strategic analysis groups." While Gallagher would not describe the exact purpose of such a category, he said the arrangement is designed to give growers personal help in solving their debt problems. "I call it trying to minimize the loss to their estate," he said.

Such gentle words may bring a harsh reality for farmers, however. "In some cases, you may just say, 'I'm sorry, we can't go any further,' " Gallagher said. "Because it's gone."

PROFITS? STATE FARMERS SEEK SURVIVAL

(By Sally Lehrman)

SALINAS.—The question haunting every California farmer this year is not whether he will make a living, but whether he will survive.

The answer is not easy.

The harsh economic realities battering the state's farm industry don't seem to be letting up. Land values remain flat and growers' debt continues to soar. And analysts predict that the 1985 Reagan farm bill will drop the net income of U.S. farms 18 percent lower than its current rate.

See-sawing prices have plagued farmers for years. Growers tired of battling the world market on their own have asked for the government's help.

For some, 70 percent parity, or government-guaranteed prices equal to their cost of production, is the only solution. They say it will be impossible for them ever to make a living as long as they have to compete with unpredictable world prices.

The American Agriculture Movement advocates increasing the amount of government loans made against stored crops to cover the rising costs of production. Farmers who can't get a decent price for their crop are allowed to store it in exchange for a government loan. But support prices and loan rates are just 49 percent of parity right now, according to Wayne Meyer, president of the California chapter of the American Agriculture Movement.

"We've got to at least get some prices where we can cover our costs of production," he says. "Otherwise, nobody's going to stay in business. It's like standing out on the street corner selling dollar bills for 49 cents."

Meyer says that if loan rates for U.S. crops go up to 70 percent of parity, the world price will rise to match them. If it doesn't, the government should tack on protective tariffs or quotas, he says.

For example, a Sacramento grower now has a rough time finding someone to buy his rice for $6.50 to $7 per hundredweight when warehouses are filled with rice shipped in from Thailand at $4 a hundredweight.

"If we've got more rice than we know what to do with, why are we importing rice?" Meyer asks.

He says the containers shoppers carry to the grocery counter should show clearly where the food was grown, so consumers know when they are buying from American farmers.

Tim Wallace, an agriculture economist for the University of California, agrees that a parity program would encourage shoppers to buy domestic foods. But even though the money would go directly into U.S. government coffers, possibly to be doled out for commodity programs, such a policy could eventually hurt farmers, he warns.

"Foreign nations would retaliate, probably, by saying, 'You put a tariff on us, we'll put a tariff on you,' " he says.

Meyer argues that the nation is already engaged in a trade war and is losing it pretty badly. "They're already slapping tariffs on us, and we're not doing a thing," he says.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is hoping to help struggling farmers stay in business with a debt-restructuring plan. According to the proposal, a grower would divide his debt into two parts. He would continue to pay regular interest and principal on a manageable portion, and pay 3 percent interest but no principal on the rest of the amount owed.

Banks would be able to avoid classifying restructured loans as "non-performing" and would temporarily be allowed to operate at a lower capital base.

Bankers like the idea and have come up with their own recommendations. The American Bankers Association has proposed a three-part relief package for farmers. The goal is to stabilize three components of the farm crisis: bank capital, borrowers' cash-flow ability and farm asset value, according to Michael Fitch, chairman of the association.

The bankers advocate new accounting procedures to help banks bear the strain by spreading losses over a longer period. An interest rate buydown would assist cash-strapped borrowers by allowing them to pay back their loans at a lower rate under certain conditions. And asset values could stabilize if banks were allowed to put troubled farm loans in a quasi-governmental financial corporation that would hold farm land off the market until the economy improves.

California banks would like to be able to hold repossessed farm land for longer than the current five-year limit. They also suggest an institutional secondary market for farm real estate loans that could resell guaranteed loans to investors as mortgage-backed securities.

But to the farmer going over this season's budget, such solutions seem terribly distant.

While the dollar's strength has faltered a bit and sinking oil prices have helped boost

Third World economies, California farmers continue to combat a strengthening foreign presence in their formerly exclusive markets.

Bankers are making trips to Washington in alarm. Legislators are approving emergency measures to help growers keep their farms, and are proposing revisions to the farm bill.

But as the powerful hammer out policy, the farmer must pull on his boots, walk out to a muddy barren field and make a decision.

Most California farmers have cut costs beyond the point where they might hurt an acre's yield. They have gone back repeatedly to their bankers to ask for money. They have sold some of their land and canceled leases on nearby property they used to farm.

They know that only the most conservative, only the most savvy, will make it this year.

Ed Boutonnet unfolds sheet after sheet of numbers. The Castroville grower says he hasn't made a profit in four years. This year, he had hoped to break the jinx. But cold weather recently swept through his fields and burned the tips of rows of healthy artichokes.

It's a fact of life for a farmer that a little blister on a leaf can destroy his income.

Boutonnet and his partners run the state's largest artichoke operation. The 175 acres he once farmed have swelled to 5,500 acres and a packing and shipping company. But even Boutonnet, with a master's degree in soil science and vegetable production from Cornell University, is worried.

After the cold spell, his price for a carton of artichokes plunged to $5 from $15.

"We need $10 a carton, on average, to break even," he says. "Unless we can get up to $10 to $12 a carton, we're in serious trouble."

Boutonnet has broken out every little cost that goes into growing an artichoke. His list of numbers includes power, planting, sprinkler pipe, insecticide, rodent control and hoeing. Checking the figures over and over, he has finally found room for improvement.

"We've got a permanent drip irrigation trial in," he says. "If it works, we're going to eliminate our labor. You can irrigate six to seven hundred acres with one man."

In this way, Boutonnet thinks he can cut irrigation labor costs three-quarters and possibly reduce his power bill by one-third.

Boutonnet is one of the few farmers who has the funds to make an investment in order to save money in the long run. But he refuses to borrow to do it. His caution may keep him in business.

"We finance our own farming operations," he says. "We do not have any operational loans. We've never expanded on credit.

"That's basically a very conservative philosophy. That's not the philosophy they teach you in school."

The growers who followed their textbooks and fattened their farms are now drowning in debt. The farm crisis may finally winnow the industry to those like Boutonnet, who won't borrow a cent.

"Maybe we were a little slow in the '60s," he says, "but we're still in business.

"Most of our land is paid for and we will not borrow against our property to operate," he says. "A lot of farmers get into trouble that way—I'll quit before I do that."

Today, Boutonnet is moving quickly. He pulled 450 acres out of artichoke production last year. He says he'd rather invest money in unused ground than put cash into a crop that may not bring in anything. He's working on marketing ideas and will pore over his brown folder of budget breakdowns several more times. But he says it's unlikely he'll find a place to make additional cuts.

"We're not switching crops, we're not going to alternate crops," he says. "We've run a tight operation and we continue."

Farmers throughout the state will have a tough time cutting production costs this year, according to Ronald Brase, president of Crop Care Services Inc., a Fresno consulting firm. The growers have already shaved them to the minimum.

That leaves yield—the measure of how much produce comes off an acre of land.

"The only thing they can do is work with yield," Brase says. He argues that farmers should boost their production expenses in strategic places in order to increase yield. In other words, they should look for the factor, like insects or disease, that's limiting the amount their fields can produce—and correct it.

An improved yield can dramatically cut the cost per head of lettuce or bunch of spinach. But most growers don't have money to spare and can't get their banks to forward the cash for such a project, he says. So their only hope is to consider growing an unusual mix of crops or to try to get a contract in advance. That way a cotton or wheat grower can be sure of a certain price for his goods, and thus will know how much he can spend.

STATE FARMING GOES TO SEED—MORE FORECLOSURES THAN AT ANY TIME SINCE GREAT DEPRESSION

(By Sally Lehrman)

Quietly and mercilessly, despair is sweeping through California's ravaged agricultural economy.

It once seemed the state's fertile hillsides and valleys would blossom with prosperity forever. But now farms from one end of California to the other are folding too quickly to count.

"I've never seen it like this," said Ken Billings, president of the Federal Land Bank in Fresno.

News of farm failures in the Midwest continues to stun the nation. But few outside the industry realize that the crisis also has devoured the vitality of the nation's largest farm state—California.

California growers are staggering under a debt load five times the amount of their net income, according to government statistics. Foreclosures of farm property in the state have reached a number unseen since the Great Depression.

The California farmer has been hit all at once by subsidized world competition, high interest rates, a strong dollar and eroding land values. Not only has it become nearly impossible to make a living, but most farmers can't make payments on their debt. To make things worse, recent heavy storms crushed any hope farmers may have had for a better year in 1986.

From the conservative old-timer to the eager graduate of the University of California at Davis, nearly every grower is struggling to survive just one more season.

"They have cut production costs as much as they can, 10 percent to 20 percent, but their costs keep going up," Billings said. "They're letting more weeds grow, not fertilizing as much as they should. They're using bailing wire to hold their equipment together." They're also hedging on the water bill, trying to renegotiate the rent and going to work part time in the city.

One Los Banos almond and walnut grower and his wife sold their house and are raising their two young boys on just $300 a month—the precious bit left over after buying the fertilizer, the water and the labor vital to their orchards.

Their neighbor, George Lindemann, a once-prosperous beef, dairy and vegetable grower, sold one operation after another in a four-year race to keep up with his mounting losses. Last month, in desperation, he auctioned off every tractor and hand tool that wasn't essential.

Even Ed Boutonnet, a partner in Castroville-based California Artichoke, the nation's largest artichoke growing and packing operation, has cut costs everywhere it seems possible. He hasn't made a profit since 1981 and is helplessly watching the price of artichokes fall below cost once again this year.

"They're doing some dramatic cost-cutting and selling off some land," Billings said. "But the problem is, they can't continue doing that. You can buy a little time—but if this thing continues for five or six years, we may lose quite a few farmers." The toll, he said, may be as many as one-third of the state's growers.

The state's top two commercial farm lenders, Bank of America and Wells Fargo Bank, have foreclosed or accepted voluntary takebacks on property worth more than $210 million. Insurance companies, unable to extract payments from farmers, also have snatched up land. New Jersey-based Prudential Insurance Co. of America, for example, holds about 45,600 acres in foreclosed properties in its Western region, a 13-fold increase from its 1984 holdings of 3,400 acres.

But the astounding rate of foreclosures reflects only a tiny portion of the California farmers who have had to give up their only security—land. Pleading with their bankers to grant one more year's operating credit, most are selling bits of acreage just to meet their interest payments.

Estimates vary on just how many farmers are teetering on the edge of bankruptcy. The American Bankers Association in Washington, D.C., figures that 15 percent of California's 35,000 full-time growers are in serious trouble and nearly 10 percent more are finding it difficult to make payments on their debt. Cornelius Gallagher, vice president for agribusiness at Bank of America, estimates the number of farmers whose net worth is slipping below zero to be as high as 33 percent.

Cattle ranchers, cotton farmers and rice growers have taken the worst beating, according to Henry Voss, president of the California Farm Bureau Federation. Even the giant cotton and grain grower J.G. Boswell has been stricken. The half-century-old company recently announced that it was slicing its work force by about a quarter, bracing for at least another year of poor revenue.

"We've got a whale of a supply of cotton out there, and that's causing tremendously depressed prices," said Ed Giermann, corporate counsel for the Kings County-based operation.

"We have growers who are just as distressed as growers in the Mid-west," said Tom Smith, president of Calcot Ltd. a Bakersfield cotton marketing cooperative. "They're going into a survival mode, making sure they can pay their bills."

Farming competes with tourism as California's largest industry. The state's more than 200 crops brought in an estimated $14.3 billion in 1985, the highest farming income in the nation. According to the California Crop and Livestock Reporting Service, agriculture directly employed 500,000 people and contributed $50 billion to the gross state product of $500 billion in 1984.

Agricultural specialists have always said California was immune to a farm crisis. Fertile soil, good weather and a bountiful selection of crops shielded growers here from the whims of the market, they said. But the wave of misfortune devastating the Midwest has arrived in the Golden State.

California's rural backbone is buckling under its worst financial stress in more than 50 years, with net annual farm income from 1982 to 1984 below the level of every year from 1972 to 1981 after discounting for inflation.

Agriculture specialists often point to exports as the root of the disaster here. California's farm exports slid to $2.9 billion in 1984, a 31 percent drop from a peak of $4.2 billion in 1981. The strength of the dollar has made California products more expensive to foreign buyers. And many nations subsidize their agriculture, making it possible to undercut U.S. prices.

Nations that once depended on California for commodities now grow their own and even export to this country. South Korea, which once bought the bulk of its rice from the state, has become self-sufficent. China, long a hungry market for California cotton, has grown into a tough competitor on the world market.

"We lost a lot of the international market," Voss said. "We have a mature market in this country and we can't absorb much more. If we could improve the world market, things would improve pretty quickly in California."

Imports exert the other half of the world pressure on California farming. The state once worried little about competition from foreign fruits and vegetables. Now products such as wine and canned fruit are bumping local goods off the grocery shelves.

"We've exported all of our knowledge, and they have on top of that a very cheap, cheap labor situation," said Dorothy Mortensen, spokeswoman for several fruit and vegetable growers' cooperatives.

Almost no fruit products were shipped into the United States until 1984. This year, however, the California Peach Association predicts that about 2 million cases of peaches, pears and other fruits will pour in from Europe, Australia, South Africa and South America.

The imports already have pushed many growers out of business and prompted discouraged survivors to dig up one-third of their trees in five years. Acreage planted in peaches plummeted to 27,000 in 1985 from 40,000 five years earlier.

The intense price competition and a shrinking world market have pushed prices for foods from cauliflower to cotton well below the cost to grow them.

"There's no crop that you can clearly see a profit on," said Ronald Brase, president of Crop Care Services, Inc., a consulting service in Fresno. For example, Thompson seedless grapes cost about $870 an acre to grow. At $70 a ton and an average yield of 9.1 tons, they bring in just $637 an acre. In one season, the farmer loses $233 an acre.

Eroding land prices add the last straw to the fiscal weight breaking farmers' backs across the state. The average farm value in California plunged to $1,726 an acre in 1985 from $1,918 an acre the year before. That 10 percent drop compares with a 13 percent slide across the nation to $679 an acre from $782, according to California Department of Agriculture statistics.

Pockets of the state have seen land values plunge more quickly than have others. Wayne Zoller, an appraiser for the Colusa County assessor's office, says that in just one year, rice lands there halved in value to $1,400 an acre in 1985 from $2,600 an acre in 1984.

Farmers' ability to borrow has disappeared in tandem with their land's worth. They have little to offer as a guarantee against default on loans for this year's growing season. At the same time, banks are reminding farmers that their land's value as security is shrinking and are asking for more collateral on existing loans.

The change in the value bloats farmers' debt-to-asset ratios dramatically. Combined with a little bad luck and a few missed loan payments, it can push even the best growers over the edge.

"I think that's happening to people, and just shocking them," said BofA's Gallagher. "This thing's gone well beyond people who mismanage.

In fact, it's often the "good" managers who go out of business first—the young men and women who left their family farms to study at the University of California and returned with the gospel of agribusiness expansion. These ambitious achievers bought more land, upgraded with new equipment and diversified into a variety of crops. When the bottom fell out of commodity prices, their debt load crushed them.

At the other end of the spectrum fall the leather-skinned old hands who have always farmed by experience and sixth sense. Unable to come up with a detailed budget and a charted cash-flow projection, they are finding it more difficult to get a loan for spring planting from bankers grown stingy.

Though farmers tend to be naturally optimistic, the outlook this year isn't good. Recent storms wiped out the hopes of almond growers whose peak blossoms crumpled in the rain. Bees spooked by the rain failed to pollinate fruit trees, and many an asparagus field was washed out in the Delta Acres of mud have prevented farmers from planting cotton and canning tomatoes, a crop many thought would be able to bring in a profit this year.

The recent disaster only aggravates the pressure of high interest rates, increased foreign agricultural production and weak world economic growth. These factors led Bank of America to predict "continued stagnation at low-income levels" for the 1986 farm economy. Only the most savvy and the most conservative may survive.

Farmers who took no chances, stuck to the homestead and refused to borrow a cent still have that land and may be able to make it through another bad year. And there are pockets of plenty in the grim outlook. California oranges are selling well and land value has held. Some say avocados are making a turnaround.

But for the rest of California this may be the last year many farmers put food on their families tables by tilling the soil their fathers worked.

S. 2316. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to specify information which is to be included in manifests submitted for vessels and vehicles arriving in the United States from a contiguous country; to the Committee on Finance.

MANIFESTS FOR VESSELS AND VEHICLES FROM A CONTIGUOUS COUNTRY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to remedy a loophole in the laws governing the disclosure of information concerning goods imported into the United States.

In 1984, I introduced legislation, enacted by Congress as part of Public Law 98-573, which explicitly provided for the disclosure of basic information concerning goods imported into the United States. That law also contained specific mechanisms to protect confidential business information. For example, under Public Law 98-573 the identity of any importer/consignee and the identity of the foreign shipper to such importer/consignee may be kept confidential as the result of a biennial certification request of the American importer/consignee.

Under that legislation, U.S. manufacturers, transportation companies, port authorities, and others have been able to better plan, promote domestic enterprise, and compete in world markets. In addition, the information made available under the legislation has assisted Government agencies in monitoring our international trade flows.

However, the Customs Service has interpreted Public Law 98-573 to apply only to information concerning goods imported by ocean vessels. They have excluded information on manifests submitted for vehicles—for example, trucks and rail—and nonocean vessels of less than 5 net tons. Thus, no information is made available concerning overland importations from Canada and Mexico. There is no logical reason why overland importations from Canada and Mexico should be kept secret.

My bill would apply the disclosure provisions and protections we enacted in Public Law 98-573 to truck, rail and small barge importations from Mexico and Canada. As a result, it would equalize the treatment of all importations, whether by land or by sea, and eliminate the distinctions that have been applied solely on the basis of the mode of transportation utilized to bring goods into the United States. I continue to believe that the full disclosure of import and export data helps U.S. industries better compete. It also allows our transportation companies to develop and plan more effectively.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2316

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 2317. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 to require the Secretary of Agriculture to make deficiency payments for the 1986 crops of wheat and feed grains not later than the end of the fifth month of the marketing years for such crops; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today will require deficiency payments for the 1986 wheat and feed grains farm programs be paid at the same time as they have in previous years. This bill is simple and to the point. All we will be saying by passing this legislation is that farmers will get paid for their production the same year they produce it.

The farm bill, as it stands now, would not allow farmers to be paid their final deficiency payment for their 1986 crop until October 1987, 1½ years after they planted it and 1 year after harvest. This would be the same as asking some one who works in the city to work today even though he won't get his pay check until next year.

This problem is even more severe because of the severe cash-flow problems being experienced by our Nation's farmers. In previous years farmers have been given both their deficiency payment and their Commodity Credit Corporation loan by the spring of the marketing year. This cash-flow situation was very helpful to both farmers and lenders in estimating cash-flows for both that marketing year and the previous year. With the farm bill postponing that final payment until October 1987 many lenders are throwing it out of the cash-flow projections all together. As a result of this late payment, farmers who would have attained credit under the formula and time table used in previous year's farm programs are now being turned down. Because of this cash-flow problem established in the farm bill many farmers, who have survived all the other hurdles established under this farm program, are going to be forced out of business because of a lack of credit.

There is another hidden penalty that exists for our farmers as a result of the way this farm program calculates the final deficiency payment. This final payment is estimated on a 12-month average rather than a 5-month average. The result of this calculation is that farmers may end up getting less because the 12-month average may move up the national average price and therefore lower the total deficiency payment.

The net effect of the way these deficiency payments are being calculated and paid, is that farmers will receive less money at a later date then they would in previous programs. Farmers cannot afford these policies that pick away at the safety net they so desperately need.

I strongly encourage my colleagues to support this bill and help farmers with this credit and income problem.●

(iii) The District Court of Guam may appoint one or more magistrates for the defense sites in Palau. Such Magistrates shall have the power and the status of Magistrates appointed pursuant to chapter 43, title 28, United States Code, provided, however that such Magistrates shall have the power to try persons accused of and sentence persons convicted of petty offenses, as defined in section 1(3), title 18, United States Code, including violations of regulations for the maintenance of peace, order, and health issued by the Commanding Officer on such defense sites, without being subject to the restrictions provided for in section 3401(b), title 18, United States Code.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE COMPANY OF FREE ASSOCIATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND PALAU

The Compact of Free Association with Palau is divided into a preamble and four titles: Governmental Relations; Economic Relations; Security and Defense Relations; and General Provisions.

[Preamble]

The Preamble states that the relationship which will exist between the United States and emergent state of Palau is "Free Association."

The Preamble recognizes that the agreement is concluded on a government-to-government basis; that the peoples of Palau, as inhabitants of the Trust Territory, have and retain sovereignty and their sovereign right to self-determination; that, as a Freely Associated State (FAS), Palau will be self-governing under its constitution; and that the political and legal relationship between Palau and the United States is fully described and governed by the Compact. The Preamble recognizes the competence of the constitutional government to enter into the Compat.

TITLE ONE: GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Article I, Self-Government.

Section 111. This section recognizes that the people of Palau, acting through their constitutional government, are self-governing. This recognition is the foundation of the government-to-government agreement and is consistent with the international political status of free association.

Article II, Foreign Affairs.

Section 121. The United States, in this section, recognizes the capacity of Palau, as a FAS, to conduct foreign affairs in its own name and right. This includes the capacity to enter into treaties and other international agreements with other governments or international organizations, as appropriate. This recognition of foreign affairs capacity by the United States acknowledges the international legal personality of the FAS. Thus, for example, while the United States will provide certain services under the Compact, these activities will take place on a government-to-government basis through an international agreement, rather than by the direct extension of U.S. domestic programs as was done during Trusteeship pursuant to Article 3 of the Trusteeship Agreement. Palau agrees in this section to conduct affairs of state in accordance with international law and settle disputes by peaceful means.

Section 122. In this section, the United States agrees to support Palau's participation and membership in regional and international organizations as may be mutually agreed from time to time.

This section also obligates the United States to accept qualified Palauan citizens for training in the Foreign Service Institute. This program will contribute to Palau's capabilities to meet the demands of the new political status and promote inter-governmental cooperation between Palau and the United States.

Section 123. In this section, Palau agrees to consult with the United States in foreign affairs matters in recognition of the authority and responsibility of the United States under Title Three (security and defense relations).

This section also provides that the United States will consult with Palau on foreign affairs matters which relate to or affect Palau.

Section 124. This section describes the foreign affairs authority of the Government of Palau, which extends to marine resources, and its territorial jurisdiction and sovereignty as recognized by international law. Under this provision Palau would have the same basic attributes of governmental authority, sovereignty and jurisdiction as other members of the international community, subject to applicable international law, including the provisions of the Compact which place certain limitations on Palau's authority.

Section 125. This section provides for termination of all obligations, responsibilities, rights and benefits of the United States under any treaty made applicable to the Trust Territory during the Trusteeship. The continued application of such treaties to Palau will be determined in accordance with international law, and will thus depend upon the relations between Palau and other signatories of such agreements. However, under Title III and the separate agreements concluded pursuant thereto, defense treaties and international security agreements will continue in force.

Section 126. This section is a disclaimer by the United States of responsibility for actions taken by the Government of Palau in the exercise of its foreign affairs capacity, except where the United States agrees to accept such responsibility.

Section 127. This section authorizes the United States, upon request, to assist Palau in foreign affairs matters, and includes a disclaimer of United States responsibility for actions of the FAS taken with the assistance or through the agency of the United States Government.

Article III, Communication.

Section 131. This section recognizes Palau's authority and responsibility to control domestic and foreign communications, and enables the United States to provide such assistance as representing Palau before the International Telecommunications Union with respect to frequency registration and broadcast scheduling until Palau chooses to undertake that function. The specific types of assistance are set forth in the separate agreement referred to in this section. This section also extends Federal Communications Commission jurisdiction to Palau as regards the operations of satellite earth terminal stations operated by U.S. common carriers. Under this arrangement, Palau will be included in the United States telecommunications system for rate-making and other operational aspects relating to United States common carriers.

Section 132. This section ensures United States ability to operate telecommunications systems in Palau in connection with its obligations under the Compact.

Article IV, Immigration.

Section 141. This section effectively exempts Palauan citizens meeting specified criteria from certain United States passport, visa and work permit requirements and enables them to enter, reside, be employed, attend school or remain as visitors in the United States. Section 141 also recognizes the ability of the United States Congress to promulgate, or authorize the legislatures of United States territories to promulgate, non-discriminatory immigration laws or regulations applicable to FAS citizens who wish to establish "habitual residence" in those U.S. territories. Habitual residence is defined as establishment of a place of general abode or principal, actual dwelling place of a continuing or lasting nature and of at least one year duration.

Finally, entry into the United States under the authority of Section 141(a) does not confer the right of Palauan citizens to establish residency necessary for naturalization. Section 141(a), however, does not preclude Palauan citizens from acquiring lawful permanent resident status by other means.

Section 142. Palauan reciprocity for the open immigration arrangement provided under Section 141 is set forth in this section, under which United States citizens will be able to enter, reside and be employed in Palau, subject only to Palauan law providing for exclusion of undesirable aliens and statutes regulating occupations on a non-discriminatory basis. Establishment of "habitual residence" in Palau by United States citizens would also be subject to Palauan law. This section also confers most favored nation status in immigration matters on United States citizens.

Section 143. The privileges of Palauan citizens set forth in Sections 141 and 142 will be lost to a citizen of Palau who takes an affirmative step to preserve or acquire a citizenship or nationality other than that of Palau or fails to renounce such an existing citizenship or nationality within two years after the effective date of the Compact.

Section 144. This section enables United States citizens to accept employment by the Government of Palau without losing their U.S. citizenship.

Article V, Representation.

Section 151-152. These sections provide for the establishment of resident representatives in the capitals of the United States and Palau. Designated representatives are entitled to limited or functional immunity, exemptions and privileges in connection with the performance of official duties.

Article VI, Environmental Protection.

Section 161-162. The sections within this article establish an environmental protection policy based upon reciprocity and mutual agreement in the establishment of procedures and requirements for activities of both governments. Existing environmental standards will provide the base line for regulating governmental activities except as otherwise mutually agreed, and disputes will be subject to arbitration. Palauan environmental protection law will govern private sector activities.

Article VII, General Legal Provisions.

Section 171. Because the United States has extended United States laws to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands only by virtue of the Trusteeship Agreement, with the exception of laws of general extra-territorial applicability, this section operates to terminate the application of Palau of any laws of the United States whenever made applicable to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands or any part thereof, unless they are specifically made applicable by the Compact or are of general extraterritorial applicability.

Section 172. This section provides that citizens of Palau not residing in the United States shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as any other non-resident aliens and that they shall be treated as "persons" within the meaning of the Administrative Procedures Act and of the Freedom of Information Act. It should also be noted that a United States citizen who becomes a citizen of Palau and who does not renounce his United States citizenship would retain his United States citizenship and continue to be entitled to the same rights and privileges as any other United States citizen.

Section 173. The United States and Palau undertake positive obligations to protect the programs, personnel, property and facilities of the other which are connected with public and official functions specified in the Compact or its related agreements.

Section 174. Subsections (a) and (d), taken together, provide that the Government of Palau will be immune from jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and vice versa, except when the defendant government is sued in connection with commerical activities, personal injury, death or damage to or loss of property.

Subsections (b) and (c) of this section set forth the procedure for payment of claims against the Trust Territory Government or the United States arising from acts or omissions of either such government prior to the effective date of the Compact. All unpaid judgments against the Trust Territory Government or the United States entered prior to the effective date of the Compact, or settlements reached, will be paid by the United States. All claims against the Trust Territory or United States which are not resolved prior to the effective date of the Compact or which arise afterwards, will be adjudicated in the courts of Palau, but any judgment of those courts will be presented for certification to the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit which shall order payment of such judgment, unless it is manifestly erroneous in law or fact, or is manifestly excessive. In this latter situation, that court shall have jurisdiction to modify the judgment.

Section 175. This section provides for the negotiation of separate agreements regarding extradition, mutual assistance in law enforcement and transfer of prisoners. These agreements shall have the force of law and shall be similar to arrangements which the United States has with other nations.

Section 176. This section preserves judgments established in civil litigation during the Trusteeship by the courts of the Trust Territory, subject to the power of the courts of Palau derived from their respective constitutions to modify judgments in appropriate cases.

Section 177. This section enables federal agencies providing services and programs in Palau to settle and pay tort claims arising from their activities pursuant to the administrative procedures set forth at 28 U.S.C. 2672. Claims not resolved through that procedure will be referred to arbitration under the conference and dispute resolution process set forth in Title Four, Article II, of the Compact. In both cases, payment shall be made pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 1304. The United States will be immune from suits based on claims covered by the provisions of this section.

TITLE TWO: ECONOMIC RELATIONS

(The chart attached as Appendix A displays the amounts and schedule for payment of grant funding and assistance set forth in the Compact and discussed in the following analysis.)

Article I, Grant Assistance.

Sections 211-212. These sections set forth the basic grant assistance constituting the economic foundation of free association. The fundamental concept underlying the grant assistance is that Palau will be provided with the resources to plan and implement long-term development programs and provide public services appropriate to conditions and needs as determined by the Government of Palau in accordance with its constitutional processes. A capital account and a current account will be established from grant funds, to be used for economic development and government operations, respectively.

In order to enable Palau to undertake economic development programs at the outset of the initial fifteen years of free association, the grant assistance package was structured to provide maximum "front-end loading" of grant and special purpose funding, while at the same time spreading out funding levels over the entire fifty-year period to ensure that minimum needs can be satisfied and that economic stability can be preserved throughout the entire period of free association. Thus, at the tenth anniversary of the effective date of the Compact, the amounts of grant will be reduced from the higher levels provided during the first years, and in years sixteen through fifty funding will be obtained from the proceeds of the sixty-six million dollar fund to be established under Section 211(f).

Section 212 provides for road construction and payment of the capital account funding for basic capital improvement programs to support economic development objectives.

Section 213. This section provides for a payment in conjunction with the exercise of rights to defense sites under Article II of Title Three.

Section 214. This section transfers existing Trust Territory funding for Palau to Palau, for use in accordance with the purposes for which Congress appropriated the funds. The United States will make the determination as to the purposes which the funds can be used.

Section 215. This section provides for an annual adjustment of the designated grants provided under this article by two-thirds of the percentage annual change in the United States Gross National Product Implicit Price Deflator, or seven percent, whichever is less.

Article II, Program Assistance.

Section 221. While Palau will fund the basic functions of government from grant assistance and general revenues, performance of certain activities will be beyond the technical capability of the new governments at the outset of free association. Thus, the United States has agreed in Section 221(a) to continue to provide services of the United States Weather Service, the United States Federal Emergency Management Agency, the United States Postal Service, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Civil Aeronautics Board or its successor agencies. (Since the CAB has been abolished, this provision of the Compact refers to services provided by the CAB's successor agencies). Enactment of Section 221(a) by Congress provides the legislative authority for provision of these services. The specific arrangements for provisions of these services are set forth in a separate agreement. The United States commitment is expressly limited to continuation of the essential services specified at levels equivalent to the last year prior to the effective date of the Compact. This will establish a ceiling on the nature and extent of United States programs.

Subsection (b)(1) provides a $2 million annual grant to be coupled with the scholarship and health service funding set forth in Section 211(d) in order to enable Palau to augment current account expenditures in the field of education and health services and tailor such activities as scholarship programs and medical referral activities to local needs. Subsection (b)(2) provides an additional $8.7 million for education programs similar to those Federal educational programs to be phased out under the Compact.

Subsection (c) provides that alternate energy development progams which were extended to the Trust Territory will continue after the effective date of the Compact and be available subject to the terms set forth in United States law with respect to the scope and duration of such programs.

Subsection (d) defines United States authority incident to implementing program assistance.

Section 222. Under this section, United States Government agencies which have statutory authority to provide technical assistance on an intergovernmental or international basis, or to territories or possessions of the United States, will be able to provide such technical assistance to Palau upon request. In light of the free association relationship, Palauan requests for technical assistance will be given priority consideration over request of other nations eligible for such assistance.

Section 223. This section ensures that those Trust Territory students embarked upon a course of study at a United States-accredited post-secondary institution and who receive Federal student financial assistance will be able to continue to receive such assistance for the duration of the individual academic programs up to four years following the effective date of the Compact.

Section 224. This section provides that the United States and Palau may agree on the extension of federal programs, assistance, or services in addition to those specified in the Compact. While the grant assistance and services provided by Title Two constitute a negotiated and agreed package, this section enables the United States and Palau to adjust to changing conditions and needs by establishing such additional programs as may be authorized by United States law.

Article III, Administrative Provisions.

Section 231. This section requires that prior to the effective date of the Compact Palau submit and that the United States concur in a national economic development plan which shall provide for the manner in which Article I, Title Two grant funds shall be expended. This section also requires that the Government of Palau submit an annual report to the President and Congress on the expenditure of Compact grant assistance.

Section 232. This section provides that the program assistance to be made available under Section 221 be defined in separate agreements. The levels and duration of such assitance, and the legal parameters within which federal agencies will operate—including the legal status of their employees, payment of claims, entry and departure of employees and other similar matters—are dealt with in the comprehensive agreement negotiated pursuant to this section. Under that agreement, federal agency civilian employees will enjoy certain privileges, exemptions and limited immunity from Palauan laws, including tax laws, and federal agencies are assured the operational freedom necessary to carry out their responsibilities.

Section 233. This section authorizes the United States to conduct audits of grant and program assistance provided to Palau under Title Two. These audits will enable the United States to determine if Palau has met the requirements set forth in the Compact and its separate agreements regarding the purposes for which funds and program assistance are to be used and the propriety of their financial transactions. The procedures for conduct of the audits will be the subject of consultation to ensure that institutional integrity is preserved, and that the United States will have full access to financial information relating to Compact funding. The procedures for conducting the audit and obtaining annual reports and other financial information as required by the Compact are the subject of a separate agreement on fiscal procedures between the United States and Palau.

Section 234. This section provides for the transfer to Palau at no cost United States property located in the Trust Territory for which there is no continuing U.S. need. This transfer process is largely complete. Transfer of federal property began in the Trust Territory in 1980, pursuant to Section 402 of United States Public Law 96-597.

Section 235. During the Trusteeship, trust funds have been established for the benefit of various groups of Trust Territory citizens, such as those affected by the United States nuclear testing programs in the Marshall Islands. This section provides for appointment by the United States of a new trustee to replace the High Commissioner as trustee of such funds, so that the initial legislative intent in creating the funds can be carried out. The United States also agrees to carry out such functions of government formerly exercised by the High Commissioner as are necessary to implement the provisions of a particular trust. For instance, the High Commissioner is currently required to make certain determinations and exercise certain administrative functions in connection with trust funds. Under the Compact, this will be undertaken by the United States.

Section 236. This section pledges the full faith and credit of the United States for payment of the amounts provided for under Article I of Title Two. A similar pledge is contained in the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States. This pledge is intended to create an enforceable obligation of the United States to pay the amounts provided for in Article I. While this obligation will be discharged in the same manner as other financial obligations incurred through international agreements requiring an act of appropriation, Palau is provided with a judicial remedy before the United States Claims Court in the event payments owing under the Compact are not made. Because the Compact will be both an international agreement and public law, this is a valid grant of jurisdiction which contains an express exception from the restriction contained in 28 U.S.C. 1502 relating to actions arising from treaties with foreign nations. Any judgments resulting from an action by Palau under this section would be paid under 31 U.S.C. 1304.

Article IV, Trade.

Sections 241-243. These sections provide that Palau will not be within the customs territory of the United States, and will be able to export products to the United States duty free, provided that less than 70% of the products' value derives from foreign sources. This treatment of Palauan articles is tied to and will remain the same as the treatment which United States insular possessions receive under General Headnote 3(a) of the United States Tariff Schedule. There is a cap on duty free tuna imports and certain other articles are expressly excluded from duty free treatment. Palauan articles not covered by General Headnote 3(a) and United States articles imported into Palau will be entitled to generally applicable most favored treatment.

Article V, Finance and Taxation.

Section 251. This section establishes United States currency as the legal tender of Palau, but gives Palau the option to issue its own currency; in which case appropriate transitional arrangements would be agreed upon.

Section 252. This section recognizes Palua's jurisdiction to tax any United States persons income which is derived from sources in Palau, and applies United States tax laws to determine income source.

Section 253. Palauan citizens domiciled in Palau who are nonresident in the United States and who are not also United States citizens will be exempt from United States estate gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes. It is intended that questions of citizenship and domicile for such individual persons in Palau will be determined under the laws of Palau (see Section 142(a) of the Compact).

Section 254. Persons who meet bona fide residency requirements in Palau will not have to pay any otherwise applicable United States tax on income which is taxed by Palau, including where such income is derived from sources outside Palau.

Section 255. While Sections 253 and 254 are intended to provide incentives for investment in Palau for individuals, this section provides incentives for investments primarily by corporations. Thus, Palau will receive treatment as a possession of the United States for purposes of Section 936 of the United States Internal Revenue Code, which is intended to generate United States investment in developing areas that enjoy a special relationship with the United States. If the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code applicable to Palau under this section are amended, alternative but substantially equivalent beneficial arrangements will be negotiated.

Section 256. This Section makes Article V applicable after September 30, 1985.

TITLE THREE: SECURITY AND DEFENSE RELATIONS

Article I, Authority and Responsibility.

Section 311. This section, in accordance with Section 312, forecloses the territory of Palau to third country military forces.

Section 312. This section establishes as part of the free association relationship defined in the Compact the full authority and responsibility of the United States for security and defense matters in or relating to Palau. This United States authority and responsibility includes the ability to conduct military operations as required to carry out the United States security and defense role.

Section 313. To ensure that the actions of the Government of Palau do not impair the ability of the United States to exercise its authority and fulfill its responsibility in security and defense matters, Palau agrees in this section to refrain from actions which the United States determines to be incompatible with the United States security and defense role defined in the Compact. The purpose of this provision is to preserve the allocation of authority and responsibility for domestic and foreign affairs to Palau, and for security and defense to the United States.

To ensure that any U.S. determination requiring Palau to refrain from a particular action is made on the basis of full information, the United States will consult with Palau prior to making any final determination. The Government of Palau will be entitled to raise with the Secretaries of State and Defense, personally and on an expeditious basis, any concerns which might arise from a United States action under this provision.

Article II, Defense Facilities and Operating Rights.

Section 321. This section provides for a separate agreement to be concluded between the United States and Palau for the establishment and use of military areas and facilities by the United States in Palau.

Section 322. This section enables the United States to designate and requires the Government of Palau to provide sites for the activities and operations authorized under Section 321 and the separate agreement concluded pursuant thereto. This section establishes that compensation in full for all defense sites at the designated duration and level of use is provided in Title Two of the Compact.

Section 323. Pursuant to this section, the United States and Palau have concluded comprehensive agreements on military use and operating rights (MUORA) and status of forces (SOFA). These agreements are modeled on similar arrangements the United States has entered into with other countries.

The SOFA is a multilateral agreement which defines the rights and obligations of United States Armed Forces and their personnel in Palau. Specifically, the SOFA defines the protections afforded to personnel under the SOFA and addresses such issues as entry and exit requirements, use of contractors and employment of labor, tax and customs relief, criminal jurisdiction, applicability of local law, payment of claims, medical and postal services, telecommunications, and other related matters.

Section 324. This section ensures compatibility between the Compact, particularly Title Three, and Article II, Section 3 of Palau's constitution. By agreeing not to use, test, store or dispose of nuclear, toxic chemical, gas or biological weapons in Palau, the United States and Palau have eliminated any need for 75% approval of the Compact under Article II, Section 3. In order to ensure that the United States will be able to carry out its defense responsibilities this section also states the United States will be able to operate nuclear capable and nuclear propelled vessels and aircraft without confirming or denying the presence or absence of such weapons in Palau.

Article III, Defense Treaties and International Security Agreement.

Section 331. In keeping with United States responsibility and authority for security and defense matters in Palau, this section provides that security and defense agreements or treaties to which the United States is a party, and which have applied to the Trust Territory during the Trusteeship, will continue in force and be applied by the United States in the exercise of its security and defense role in Palau. In addition, the United States retains the authority to extend to Palau any security or defense agreements or treaties it may determine to be applicable, after appropriate consultation with the Government of Palau. This arrangement is necessary in light of United States treaty obligations in the region.

Article IV, Service in the Armed Forces.

Sections 341 and 342. Palau citizens will be entitled under these sections to serve voluntarily in the armed forces of the United States, but cannot involuntarily be inducted into such service unless habitual residence in the United States is established. In addition, upon nomination by their governments and if otherwise qualified, Palau citizens will be enrolled in the United States Coast Guard Academy and in the United States Merchant Marine Academy. The service and training available in the armed forces and the designated academies will provide educational opportunities not available in Palau.

Article V, General Provisions.

Section 351. Under this section, a Joint Committee will be established for the purpose of resolving disputes arising from implementation of Title Three and the separate agreements concluded pursuant to sections within Title Three. The purpose of the Joint Committee is to provide a forum for consultation regarding issues related to Title Three. Any matter which the Committee cannot resolve is referred back to the governments concerned for resolution.

Section 352. This section contains a U.S. assurance that in fulfilling its security and defense role, and in making the specific determinations incident to its authority under Title Three of the Compact, the United States will accord due respect to the authority and responsibility of the Governments of Palau as defined in the Compact.

Section 353. This section requires Palauan consent to be included in a declaration of war, and preserves future war claims by the Palauan people.

TITLE FOUR: GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article I, Approval and Effective Date.

Section 411. Under this section there is established a four-step process for approval and entry into force of the Compact. This process includes approval by the Government of Palau in accordance with its constitutional processes and approval of the Compact by the people of Palau.

The approval process also requires approval of the Compact by the United States, and agreement between the United States and the Government of Palau on its effective date. Once so approved, the United States, as administering authority of the Trusteeship, will make appropriate arrangements for termination of the Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations.

Article II, Conference and Dispute Resolution.

Sections 421–424. These sections establish the method for settlement of disputes arising in connection with the implementation and enforcement of the provisions of the Compact except for matters arising out of Title Three, which will be handled as provided for in Section 351. The procedure for dispute resolution requires that upon notification of a dispute, the parties confer on the matter. After a 90-day period, if the issue has not been resolved, the matter is referred to a three-person Arbitration Board consisting of one member appointed by each of the parties and a chairman jointly appointed by the parties or selected by lot from standing lists if mutual agreement cannot be reached. Decisions will be by majority vote and shall be binding on the parties unless it is agreed that the decision shall be advisory. The Board will also not have jurisdiction in matters arising under the general legal provisions of Article VII, Title One, except for Section 178.

Article III, Amendment.

Sections 431–433. These sections provide for bilateral and multilateral amendment of the Compact by mutual agreement of the parties affected by such amendments, as well as a review of the relationship after thirteen years.

Article IV, Termination.

Sections 441–443. The Compact provides three avenues for its termination. Under Section 441, the Compact may be terminated by mutual agreement of the United States and Palau.

Section 442 provides for unilateral termination initiated by the United States, in which case prior notice of no less than six months is required before termination is effective.

Termination by unilateral action of Palau is provided for in Section 443, which requires Palau to conduct a plebiscite on termination in accordance with its constitutional processes. A majority vote in favor of termination is required for termination to occur. The plebiscite can be conducted only upon three months' prior notice to the United States, and termination pursuant to an affirmative vote to end the agreement would not become effective until at least three months after certification of the result to the United States and notification that termination will occur.

Article V, Survivability.

Sections 451–453. These sections identify which portions of the Compact would survive, and for how long, under the different termination procedures described in Article IV of Title Four.

Should the Compact be terminated by mutual agreement pursuant to Section 441, the continuation of economic relations between the United States and Palau would be as mutually agreed.

Should termination occur at United States or Palauan initiative under Section 442 or 443, the provisions listed in section 452 of the Compact would remain in effect until the fiftieth anniversary of the effective date of the Compact, or longer if mutually agreed.

Under Section 453 the foreclosure of Palau to third country forces would continue for fifty years and therefore until terminated or amended by mutual consent, and separate agreements under Article II of Title Two will continue in accordance with their terms, notwithstanding termination or other provisions of the Compact.

Article VI, Definition of Terms.

Sections 461-462. These sections define various terms used in the Compact, and list the separate agreements concluded pursuant to the Compact.

Article VII, Concluding Provisions.

Section 471. Under this section, the signatory governments agree that they are authorized by their constitutions and laws to enter into and implement the Compact and its related agreements. This section also provides that Palau and the United States will conform their laws to the Compact prior to its effective date, so that they will be able to implement the Compact in a manner consistent with their domestic laws. Finally, in fulfillment of the obligations of the Government of the United States under paragraph (b) of this section to ensure that its laws conform with the provisions of the Compact, paragraph (c) of this section provides that the Compact will have the force and effect of a statute under the laws of the United States.

Section 472. This section provides for acceptance of the Compact by the signature of each government party to the agreement.

SEC. 2. of Joint Resolution approving Palau Compact.

This section provides for United States court jurisdiction in criminal cases over which the United States acquires the primary right to exercise criminal jurisdiction under the provisions of the Status of Forces Agreement concluded pursuant to Section 323 of the Compact.

APRIL 9, 1986.

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES: There is enclosed a draft of a Joint Resolution to approve the "Compact of Free Association," the negotiated instrument setting forth the future political relationship between the United States and Palau, a political jurisdiction of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

This Compact of Free Association is the result of more than sixteen years of continuous and comprehensive negotiations, spanning the administrations of four Presidents. The transmission of the proposed Joint Resolution today, and congressional enactment of it, marks the last step in the process for approval of the Compact.

The full text of the Compact is part of the draft Joint Resolution, which I request be introduced, referred to the appropriate committees, and enacted. I also request that the Congress note the agreements subsidiary to the Compact. Also enclosed is a section-by-section analysis to facilitate your consideration of the Compact.

On March 30, 1984, and again on February 20, 1985, I submitted to Congress a Compact of Free Association relating to the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia, two other jurisdictions of the Trust Territory. That Compact was approved as House Joint Resolution 187 by Congress on December 13, 1985, and with my signature on January 14, 1986, became Public Law 99-239. The people of the fourth jurisdiction of the Trust Territory—the Northern Mariana Islands—have voted to become a United States territory when the Trusteeship is terminated. The Congress approved their political status instrument as Public Law 94-241.

The defense and land use provisions of the Compact with Palau, and the right of the United States to foreclose access to the area for military purposes of third countries, are of great importance to our strategic position in the Pacific and enable us to continue preserving regional security and peace. Under the Palau Compact, the minimum term of United States defense authority and responsibility will be fifty years; otherwise, the Palau Compact is very similar to the Compact that the Congress approved for the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia.

For almost four decades, the Trust Territory has been administered under a Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations Security Council, which the United States entered into pursuant to the Joint Resolution of July 18, 1947. This Compact of Free Association with the government of Palau fulfills our commitment under that Agreement to bring about self-government in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the Palauan people. Termination of the Trusteeship Agreement and the formal assumption of freely chosen political status arrangements by all parts of the present Trust Territory are important foreign policy objectives of the United States.

The Compact with Palau was signed for the United States by Ambassador Fred M. Zeder II and the President of the Republic of Palau on January 10, 1986. It was approved on January 24, 1986, by both houses of the Palau National Congress. On February 21, 1986, the Compact was approved by the Palauan people in a United Nations observed plebiscite. The President of Palau has certified that the approval process has been completed in full compliance with Palau's constitutional requirements.

Enactment of this draft Joint Resolution approving the Compact of Free Association for Palau will complete the enterprise of self-government we began with the peoples of the Trust Territory many years ago. It is the final step preceding full termination of the Trusteeship Agreement. Therefore, I urge the Congress to approve the Compact of Free Association for Palau.

RONALD REAGAN.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE CANCER RESEARCH ACT OF 1986

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce today the Cancer Research Act of 1986. The bill I introduce today stands as a tangible hope for hundreds of cancer victims. A revolution has occurred in medical science, allowing understanding, treatment, even cure of disease on the molecular level where it occurs. Today, I introduce a measure seeking immediate support for a promising breakthrough in cancer therapy: Adoptive immunotherapy.

Adoptive immunotherapy, a cancer therapy developed by Dr. Stephen Rosenberg, chief of surgery at the National Cancer Institute, has been heralded by physicians, scientists, and lay leaders as one of the most significant cancer advances of our time. The process activated the body's own immune system to attack malignant cells, using a blood protein, Interleukin 2, genetically engineered in large amounts.

To date, 71 patients, all of them with extensive disease and with failures after other therapies, have been treated with this Interleukin 2 therapy. There have been highly encouraging response rates. The responses have been especially promising because they have occurred in some cancers which have been particularly difficult to treat. Kidney cancer, malignant melanoma, and colon cancer have responded at rates of 100 percent, 50 percent, and 30 percent, respectively. These should not be confused with cures. But they are unusually encouraging responses.

The history of this struggle is a long, often frustrating one. In the 1970's, we turned money and muscle to the "War on Cancer" expecting to conquer it as we had the Moon. The answers did not spring forth, and there was frustration in American homes. Today, fully 3 of 4 American families can expect at some point to face the diagnoses of cancer. Fortunately, the slow arduous process of research was not new to our scientists. It has been neessary to take years of small steps and to lay a foundation in basic medical science research. The scientists persisted in their work as we did in our support of them. The war continued against an oppressive, unrelenting foe. Thanks to breakthroughs like Dr. Rosenberg's work, the future for families who face cancer is less bleak than it once was.

Though six centers have been selected by the National Cancer Institute to receive a half million dollars for the treatment of 40 patients each, clearly this exciting new breakthrough deserves wider testing. Many questions must be answered. We must accelerate the development of this treatment into a therapy that could benefit millions of Americans.

When Dr. Rosenberg's cautious words on IL 2/LAK therapy appeared in the New England Journal of Medicine, the National Cancer Institute began receiving over 1,000 calls a day, the largest number in its history, from patients seeking placement in the program. Disease knows no prejudice.

These calls were from your constitutents and mine, people rich and poor, black and white, mothers and fathers, sons and daughters, Americans from all across the land. All were desperate for the treatment their tax dollars helped to discover. Their calls were answered but their pleas for help went unfulfilled. No funds nor mechanisms existed to extend the program.

The legislation I am introducing today will provide for 12 treatment and research sites. It will double the rate at which scientists can answer the many questions that need to be answered before this immunotherapy can surpass the experimental stage. Each center designated will receive a half million dollars.

The expansion of research on this therapy has been endorsed by the President's Cancer Panel. They asserted in their most recent report there would be an "almost immediate benefit from expanding the clinical trials of Steven Rosenberg's (sic)." They recommended $20 million to this end.

The proposal I introduce today is a modest one. It will cost only $6 million. But it will double the number of cancer centers which can begin work on this therapy and the number of patients who are hopeful of receiving benefit from it.

Mr. President, there are those who would scoff at an old man who digs in the soil to plant a sapling, wasting effort on a tree whose fruit he will not live to taste, whose shade he will never enjoy. And yet that old man continues to toil, for he has vision. He labors, not just for himself, but for his children, for their fruit, for their shade. The Congress has shown vision through tireless support for basic science research since the very inception of the National Institutes of Health. While many of us do not fully understand the intricacies of biological science, we suffer ourselves and through family and friends when those biological processes go awry. At times, we have yearned for more direct results, for more practical research. But we have held fast to our faith in scientists at the helm supported by public revenues. Small steps lead to large ones. Years of small steps and vision have contributed to the larger step we are on the verge of making today.

I submit the text of the bill for the RECORD.

The text follows:

S. 2305

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Cancer Research Act of 1986".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) in the last decade—

(A) there were in excess of 6,500,000 cases of cancer;

(B) more than 10,000,000 people were under medical care for cancer; and

(C) more than 3,500,000 people died from cancer;

(2) in 1986, one out of every five deaths in the United States will be due to cancer;

(3) three of the more common, most difficult to treat, and most fatal cancers are malignant melanoma, cancer of the colon, and cancer of the kidney; and

(4) adoptive immunotherapy, in the form of interleukin 2 lymphocyte activated killer cell therapy, has been shown to be unusually effective in the treatment of cancer of the kidney and has shown great promise in the treatment of malignant melanoma and cancer of the colon.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to provide means through which interleukin 2 lymphocyte activated killer cell therapy can be made more available to the thousands of Americans who suffer from cancer; and

(2) to foster expanded research efforts concerning methods to apply and improve interleukin 2 lymphocyte activated killer cell therapy as both a primary and an adjunctive therapy for cancer.

GRANTS AND CONTRACTS FOR RESEARCH

SEC. 3. (a) Subpart 1 of part C of title IV of the Public Health Service Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"RESEARCH ON ADOPTIVE IMMUNOTHERAPY

"SEC. 417. (a) The Director of the Institute shall make grants to, and enter into contracts with, 12 of the centers supported under section 414 for the conduct of clinical research on interleukin 2 lymphocyte activated killer cell therapy which has demonstrated particular promise for the treatment and cure of cancer.

"(b) The total amount of any grant or contract under this section for any fiscal year may not exceed $500,000.".

(b) Section 408(a)(1) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "section 412" in subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 412 and 417"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) To carry out section 417, there are authorized to be appropriated $6,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989.".●

FORMER SENATOR J.W. FULBRIGHT'S ARTICLE ON PEACE

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to note today that former Senator J.W. Fulbright of Arkansas has recently published in a national publication his thoughts on our prospects for peace and how we might best achieve it. The thrust of his argument is that we need to pursue a series of joint ventures on a wide range of cooperative levels.

It strikes me that, at a time when our country faces renewed interest in discussions with Soviet leaders, we should listen to a former Senator whose voice was always on the side of reason and good sense. I find it encouraging that Senator Fulbright continues to speak up for what he believes. For example:

"The way to prevent nuclear disaster," he writes, "is not through futile, mechanistic efforts to reduce Soviet military capabilities but through realistic attempts to influence political intentions and convictions. That is the purpose of joint ventures in various fields."

Let me commend my fellow Arkansan, Senator Fulbright, and ask that my colleagues in the Senate pay close attention to this recent article. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

OUTLOOK FOR PEACE—A DISTINGUISHED OBSERVER ASSESSES THE PROSPECTS FOR EAST—WEST COOPERATION

(By J. William Fulbright)

Now that there appears to be a thaw in East-West relations following the Geneva summit meeting between President Reagan and the Soviet Union's leader Mikhail Gorbachev, what are the prospects for peace and cooperation between our two countries? For an overview on what might lie ahead, and some suggestions on how the two nations could get along better, we invited the opinions of former U.S. Senator J. William Fulbright, who for 15 years served as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—Ed.)

In dramatic contrast to his hostile criticism of the Soviet Union five years ago, President Ronald Reagan has now engaged Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev in an amiable and extended discussion of their respective national interests. And the two followed up their Geneva talks with New Year's Day addresses to each other's nations. It's certainly a "fresh start"—the start, we may hope, of an era of continuing dialogue and cooperation in a variety of joint ventures, and the beginning of the end of the era of confrontation.

Many commentators—most, in fact—have expressed disappointment at the lack of any substantive agreements regarding arms control at the Geneva summit. My own view is that this disappointment is not justified, because it is unrealistic to expect significant arms control agreements in the atmosphere of antagonism and suspicion brought about by five years of name-calling. With the "fresh start" at Geneva, the process of reestablishing civil communication between the parties can begin; and as the proposals for the resumption of exchanges, trade, and other confidence-building joint ventures are pursued, a climate sympathetic to substantive agreements can be created.

Pacts affecting the military forces of America and Russia are the most sensitive and unlikely to be achieved until the overall climate is improved. Negotiations for the S.A.L.T. II treaty were carried on over a period of some seven years without final approval, and the negotiations of Mutual and Balanced Reduction of Forces in Central Europe have been fruitless after more than 10 years of meetings in Vienna. These experiences should teach us that our priorities are wrong, that we have put the proverbial cart before the horse and that it is now time to put the horse in front and start to move toward our objective of a peaceful world. We are wasting our time, our resources and our patience in seeking arms control agreements when both parties are obsessed by suspicion and distrust and lack even a modicum of empathy for each other.

But it should not be beyond our capacity to find the means to reduce the suspicion and distrust that has, until now, obstructed progress toward the resumption of more normal relations. To achieve this we do not have to give moral sanction to the totalitarian aspects of the Soviet system. That, I should think, would be quite impossible for people with our tradition of democracy and individual liberty. But I do think it is possible for us to think about the Russians as human beings like ourselves. We do not have to admire the Soviet system to allow the possibility that the Soviet leaders, like our own, genuinely fear for their nation's security.

In the course of my 15-year tenure as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I conducted hundreds of hearings on a wide variety of topics. In retrospect, those that had the greatest impact on my own thinking were two separate series—in 1966 and 1969—on the psychological aspects of foreign policy. A number of themes emerged from those hearings that seem pertinent to our present circumstances.

The most obvious—and perhaps most important—is that it is not reality itself that shapes our political behavior but our perception of reality, and these are not necessarily the same thing. Another theme that emerged is that antagonism between hostile groups can be either aggravated by insult and epithet or alleviated by carefully planned activities requiring cooperation and human contact.

It is in this last category—planned cooperation in chosen areas—that we may discern some hope for the future of Soviet-American relations, and therefore for world peace.

At the present time, and in the wake of last year's summit, the most dramatic and effective confidence-building measures I can think of would be a joint research program with the Russians on the "Star Wars," or Strategic Defense Initiative, advocated by President Reagan. The President has on several occasions suggested that, if the project should prove feasible, he would be prepared to share the technology with the Russians, or as he put it more recently, sell it to them "at cost."

Instead of this rather casual and condescending promise for the future, it would be far more credible and useful if the research on "Star Wars" were conducted jointly from the outset. Such a venture would enhance the likelihood of success, reduce the cost to each party, and, of far greater importance, remove the destabilizing effects of a unilateral program while contributing substantially to the development of trust and confidence in each other's intentions. President Reagan insists that his Strategic Defense Initiative is solely for defensive purposes, but the Russians obviously are not convinced.

Another important confidence-building measure would be the revival of the Soviet-American trade agreement of 1972. It is tragic that, for unrelated reasons, this agreement was breached and abandoned. It provided not only for normal tariff treatment of trade with Russia, but also for payment by the Russians of the balance of the old lend-lease account of World War II amounting to approximately $700 million. (The payment of a long overdue debt always improves one's opinion of the debtor.)

Discussions took place soon after the agreement was concluded with a view to spending part of the funds from the lend-lease settlement on a large increase in the exchange of students and teachers, an area in which the United States has almost 40 years' experience. And a record of success.

At first funded by the United States alone, cultural exchanges now receive financial support from 29 other countries. Among these nations mutual understanding and trust has been strengthened by shared, cooperative activities.

Two of our former enemies—Japan and Germany—have become prominent supporters of this venture; a more recent antagonist, the People's Republic of China, now sends its students in impressive numbers to American universities.

In view of Reagan's recent speech and his negotiation with Gorbachev at Geneva for an expansion of cultural exchanges with the Soviet Union, we may anticipate that our relations with the Russians can be changed in a similar manner.

There are many other possibilities for cooperative joint ventures that would be both cost efficient and effective in finding solutions to problems that affect all countries. We might consider, for example, cooperation in medical research; better methods to control environmental pollution; cooperative procedures to prevent the extinction of endangered species; research on the problem of more and cheaper energy; and the broad area of increasing our understanding of the natural phenomena that are of interest to all peoples.

Beyond the direct results of any research, the more important achievement would be the effect collaborative activity has on the attitudes of the Russians and Americans involved.

Can there be any doubt that a well-designed and successful joint enterprise would reduce mistrust in the minds of the participants and increase their understanding of each other's purposes?

Having worked together and shared the tribulation inherent in the solving of difficult problems, Russians and Americans could develop a sense of comradeship and trust that now seems all but inconceivable. Under these conditions—experience shows—ideology loses much of its impact and old antagonisms abate

"Stars Wars" notwithstanding, we are well past the time when either side can hope to neutralize the other's capacity to inflict nuclear cataclysm.

The way to prevent nuclear disaster is not through futile, mechanistic efforts to reduce Soviet military capabilities but through realistic attempts to influence political intentions and convictions. That is the purpose of joint ventures in various fields. With our present rough parity of nuclear power there is little risk involved in pursuing joint ventures, which also offer a much better prospect of providing for our security and preserving our solvency than we can hope to gain by expanding the arms race into space.

Unabated, the arms race eventually will result in either a nuclear war or the impoverishment of both nations. It will not—and cannot—validate the ideology of either party. All it can prove, if it has not done so already, is the compulsion of superpowers for suicidal irrationality.

Leaders of powerful nations since the beginning of history have sought to increase their power and prestige by force and violence, hoping thereby to win profit and fame. More often than not the fame obtained has been short-lived. Victors beget rivals, who then form combinations to deprive the victor of his gains, and who then go on to seek their own fame and profit through further conflicts and conquests. The cycle of victory and defeat goes on—a temporary glory followed by more lasting degradation in pursuit of the phantom of some elusive prize in an empty system of power.

Irrational and absurd though all this may have been, it did not until recent times pose a definitive threat to the survival of our species. With the coming of the nuclear age, as Albert Einstein suggested in 1945, we came to a profound break in the thread of human history. What we could at least endure in the past we can no longer even consider. Thus the need for a "new manner of thinking" if humanity is to survive.

The fundamental challenge is one of psychology and education in the field of human relations. It is not the kind of problem that is likely to be resolved by expertise—even the sophisticated expertise of our most gifted military thinkers, who delight in exotic weapons systems and strategic doctrines well beyond the comprehension of ordinary citizens. A distinguished professor once commented that there is no such thing as an expert on the subject of wisdom in human affairs. The attributes upon which we must draw are the human attributes—of compassion and common sense, of intellect and creative imagination, and of empathy and understanding between cultures.

The central issue in relations between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. is the latter's conviction that the U.S. is unwilling to recognize the legitimacy of the U.S.S.R.'s political and social system and is committed to thwarting it in every way and ultimately to changing it. The counterpart of that conviction is the belief by the U.S. that the Russians are determined to communize the world by force if the U.S. does not confront it with superior force. These beliefs, nurtured by harsh rhetoric and communication and trade boycotts, increase fear and hatred and the likelihood of a conflict. The only way to prevent such a disaster is to change these intentions and convictions: To this end, joint ventures are well designed.

Even though we do not recognize its legitimacy, the truth is that the Soviet Union is a fact of life to be dealt with and it is futile to think it will go away, that it can be intimidated by more and more nuclear arms or that it will collapse from internal weakness. Russia has so much nuclear- and manpower that there is no way the U.S. can neutralize it or deprive it of the power to do great damage to us.

The competition to militarize space should be transferred to a competition to improve the quality of life of all people. With only a fraction of the annual cost of armaments, enormous progress could be made in the eradication of poverty, of slums, of contaminated air and water, of ignorance and all the other afflictions of our people. The resources devoted to military preparations by both superpowers are so enormous that none of us can really grasp their significance and how they could transform the ordinary life of the people. We have become so traumatized by the apprehension of a nuclear war that we have forgotten the beauty and satisfaction of an ordinary way of life under peaceful conditions.

Is it unreasonable to believe that the Russian people and their government share the usual aspirations of other people for the good life, for food and shelter, and for all the amenities that make life more enjoyable and ensure a future for our children? The main difference between us is they believe they have a better system for the attainment of those blessings, a better system than ours.

Although it is no insignificant difference, the validity of each nation's views cannot be proved by a nuclear war. The value of each country's social and political system can be demonstrated only by peaceful competition, free of the distortion of life caused by the heavy burden of the arms race.

INDIANA AWARD WINNERS

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I wish to enter into today's RECORD the 1985 winning essays of a contest which I cosponsor annually with the Indiana Farm Bureau. The two winners, Amber Shoultz of Petersburg, IN, and Brian Stwalley of Fillmore, IN, traveled to Washington this spring to visit the Senate as part of their award. Their time and effort to become academic achievers should be commended and recognized. Amber and Brian are two examples of this country's continuing commitment to sound fundamentals in American education.

Mr. President, I ask that their essays on nutrition and Indiana's food production be printed in the RECORD.

The essays follow:

GOOD FOOD FROM INDIANA: FROM OUR FARMS TO OUR TABLES

(Amber Shoultz, Pike Central, Petersburg, IN)

I am only one kernel of corn in millions in this field. I am sad because when I mature, I am divided from all of my family and friends. The farmer picks me and many others. We are taken to market and sold. We are then shipped to many different places in the country. Some of us will be used as feed for livestock. Others will end up on the dinner table.

I have heard that Indiana has a large variety of nutritious foods grown within its borders. Melons, peaches, tomatoes, strawberries, and cabbage are some of the fruits and vegetables grown in Indiana. Some of the most common crops are corn, wheat, oats and soybeans. Cattle are plentiful also. The milk and meat that we get from this animal is very important in a diet.

Indiana produces most everything needed to begin and maintain a good diet. A proper diet consists of these major food groups: breads and cereals, fruits and vegetables, meat, and milk. Without the proper nutrients, you could grow weak. Your body might not function correctly. As a kernel of corn, I know. I have seen many kernels die from a lack of water and minerals. If you eat right, you will stay healthy.

Eating right not only helps you when you are young, but it also helps you to be stronger when you become old. Everyone needs nutrients, vitamins and proteins to stay alive.

Maybe it is not so bad being a kernel of corn. I get to travel through the country. I am also the most important crop in my state and one of the most important crops raised in the United States. I am high in nutrition and whoa—the farmer just picked me, so I have to go.

GOOD FOOD FROM INDIANA: FROM OUR FARMS TO OUR TABLES

(Brian Stwalley, Greencastle Middle School, Fillmore, IN)

Many plant and animal food products are grown in Indiana. Meat is one of Indiana's biggest agricultural industries. Meat contains protein, iron, and fat, three essential nutrients. Hoosiers enjoy getting their meat through beef, veal, lamb, poultry, pork, and various wild game.

One of the most important foods of Indiana is milk. Milk contains calcium and is considered a "nearly perfect food." There are quite a few dairy farmers and independent dairies in this state. If you don't like to drink milk, you may choose ice cream, cheese, butter, or yogurt.

Indiana's corn, wheat, and oat farmers help supply the nation with flour and meal as well as many varieties of cereal. Bread products contain carbohydrates, thiamin, and niacin. Hoosiers enjoy fresh baked bread anytime.

From asparagus to zucchini and everything in between, Hoosiers enjoy gardens. Various types of squash along with beans, peas, corn, cabbage, and other vegetables are raised. Fruits such as strawberries, raspberries, apples, peaches, and other fruits are plentiful. There are about 250 fresh produce markets spread throughout the state to obtain these products. Fruits and vegetables are plentiful in vitamins A, B, and C, so Hoosiers should have good eyesight.

People need to maintain a good diet in order to stay healthy and live longer, more productive lives. The food you eat affects your appearance. Your skin and hair are made from the food you eat, so it's important that you eat the right food to keep your complexion and hair healthy.

The food you eat also affects your personality and performance at your job or school. It's important to eat good food to maintain peak performance and to keep a friendly personality. Hoosiers grow and eat some of the most nutritious foods found anywhere.●

HAPPY BIRTHDAY TO DOREL CATARAMA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today marks the 35th birthday of Dorel Catarama.

Earlier this week, I met with officials of the Romanian Parliament and Embassy. It was a fine visit. It was my sense in this meeting that there is a keen interest in preserving the United States-Romanian relationship. There is concern with continued dialog and understanding, with Romania's ability to act independently, with most-favored-nation status and with the United States interest in human rights.

I communicated clearly in our meeting my strong concern for Dorel Catarama. I believe we have seen some success in the past with regard to these specific cases. It is my hope that we can work together toward that same kind of success with regard to Dorel Catarama.

His family in Chicago is quietly commemorating Dorel's birthday today. I join them on this occasion with the hope that they may be rejoined with their brother and son. I urge my colleagues to join us in this effort.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATIONS BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 35 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD notices of Senate employees who participate in programs, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35, for Mr. Charles N. Andreae, a member of the staff of Senator RICHARD G. LUGAR, to participate in a program in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Jordan, sponsored by the Union of Saudi Arabian Chambers of Commerce and Industry, from March 28–April 8, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Andreae in the program in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Jordan, at the expense of the Union of Saudi Arabian Chambers of Commerce and Industry, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35, for Mr. Andrew Wahlquist, a member of the staff of Senator JOHN WARNER, and Mr. Daryl H. Owen, a member of the staff of Senator J. BENNETT JOHNSTON, to participate in a program in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Jordan, sponsored by the Union of Saudi Arabian Chambers of Commerce and Industry and the National Council on United States-Arab Relations, from March 28–April 8, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Messrs. Wahlquist and Owen in the program in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Jordan, at the expense of the Union of Saudi Arabian Chambers of Commerce and Industry and the National Council on United States-Arab Relations, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

NATIONAL ANDREI SAKHAROV DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced a resolution, now numbered Senate Joint Resolution 323, to designate May 21, 1986, as "National Andrei Sakharov Day." Since there are so many Americans concerned with the fate of Mr. Sakharov, I have been asked to have this resolution printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in its entirety so that copies of it will be available to all congressional offices for easy distribution.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask that the full text of Senate Joint Resolution 323 be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution follows:

S.J. RES. 323

Whereas Andrei Sakharov has earned world-wide admiration and respect for his courageous and energetic efforts to secure fundamental human freedoms for the peoples of the Soviet Union, including those rights guaranteed in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe signed at Helsinki, Finland on August 1, 1975; and

Whereas Andrei Sakharov has been awarded the 1975 Nobel Peace Prize for "his love of truth and strong belief in the inviolability of human beings . . . his courageous defense of the human spirit . . ." and for his life which has made him "the conscience of mankind"; and

Whereas Andrei Sakharov, due to his selfless work for human rights and world peace, has been illegally banished by the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the closed city of Gorky, where on May 31, 1986, he will spend his sixty-fifth birthday in almost total isolation; and

Whereas Andrei Sakharov has been subjected to cruel and unusual medical procedures by the Soviet authorities when he conducted hunger strikes to protest repeated denials of his wife's, Elena Bonner's, request to be permitted to go to the West for medical treatment; and

Whereas the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has undertaken extraordinary measures, including confiscation of personal and professional correspondence and intensive physical and electronic surveillance, to isolate Andrei Sakharov and Elena Bonner in Gorky; and

Whereas the Soviet Union as signatory to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has committed itself to respect the rights to freedom of movement and of residence within the borders of each state as well as the right to leave one's own country and return to it;

Whereas the Soviet Union and other signatories of the Helsinki Final Act stated their desire "to contribute to the strengthening of peace and understanding among peoples and to the spiritual enrichment of the human personality" and were "conscious that . . . contacts between people, and the solution of humanitarian problems will contribute to the attainment of these aims," further made it their objective "to facilitate freer movement and contacts, individually and collectively, whether privately or officially, among persons, institutions and organizations of the participating States, and to contribute to the solution of the humanitarian problems that arise in that connexion;" and

Whereas the participating States of the Helsinki Final Act are convened in Bern, Switzerland at the Human Contacts Experts Meeting inter alia to discuss implementation of those Helsinki Final Act provisions concerning the resolution in a positive and humanitarian spirit questions related to family visits, the reunification of families, binational marriage and promotion of other personal and professional contacts between people and between organizations; and

Whereas Andrei Sakharov continues to advocate full compliance by all signatory states with the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; now therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (and the Senate) of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 21, 1985 is designated "National Andrei Sakharov Day" and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to urge the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to permit Andrei Sakharov and Elena Bonner freely to choose their place of residence.●

SURVIVORS OF ABORTION: THE DREADED COMPLICATION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, once each day in the United States a tiny infant survives an abortion. Contrary to what many Americans assume, late-term, third-trimester abortions are permitted by Roe against Wade. In 1973, viability was estimated to be about 28 weeks gestation, but today it is known to be between 20 and 22 weeks in 1986. And yet, today, many hospitals and clinics allow abortions to be performed after the 20th week of pregnancy.

The result is babies who occasionally survive this cruel ordeal. I call upon the Supreme Court to seriously reconsider its carte blanche endorsement of late-term abortion. I call upon this body to exercise some moral leadership in considering new ways to protect these defenseless human children who can in fact live outside the womb.

I ask that the first half of an article which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer and which won a Pulitzer Prize in 1981, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Tomorrow, I will ask unanimous consent that the second half of the article be printed.

The material follows:

ABORTION

Although abortions remain one of the major ethical controversies of our time, the fact is that an abortion has become the most common medical procedure performed on adults in the United States. More than a million and a half fetuses are aborted annually, and the number has increased about 50 percent from five years ago. At present, approximately one out of every four pregnancies is terminated by an abortion. American doctors remove more fetuses than tonsils.

But despite the intense attention the subject has received and the frequency with which the procedure is performed, something happens in a very small number of abortions, performed relatively late in the pregnancy, that no one wants to talk about. It horrifies many of the medical personnel who have encountered it.

What happens is that about once a day, somewhere in the U.S., something goes wrong and an abortion results in a live baby.

THE DREADED COMPLICATION

(By Liz Jeffries and Rick Edmonds)

A woman's scream broke the late-night quiet and brought two young obstetrical nurses rushing to Room 4456 of the University of Nebraska Medical Center. The patient, admitted for an abortion, had been injected 30 hours earlier with a salt solution, which normally kills the fetus and causes the patient to deliver a mass of lifeless tissue, in a process similar to a miscarriage.

This time, though, something had gone wrong. When nurse Marilyn Wilson flicked on the lights and pulled back the covers, she found, instead of the stillborn fetus she'd expected, a live 2½-pound baby boy, crying and moving his arms and legs there on the bed.

Dismayed, the second nurse, Joanie Fuchs, gathered the squirming infant in loose bedcovers, dashed down the corridor and called to the other nurses for help. She did not take the baby to an intensive care nursery, but deposited it instead on the stainless steel drainboard of a sink in the maternity unit's dirty utility room—a large closet where bedpans are emptied and dirty linens stored. Other nurses and a resident doctor gathered and gaped.

Finally, a head nurse telephoned the patient's physician, Dr. C.J. LaBenz, at home, apparently waking him.

"He told me to leave it where it was," the head nurse testified later, "just to watch it for a few minutes, that it would probably die in a few minutes."

This was in Omaha, in September 1979. It was nothing new. Hundreds of times a year in the United States, an aborted fetus emerges from the womb kicking and alive. Some survive. A baby girl in Florida, rescued by nurses who found her laying in a bedpan, is 5 years old now and doing well. Most die. The Omaha baby lasted barely 2½ hours after he was put in the closet with the dirty linen.

Always, their arrival is met with shock, dismay and confusion.

When such a baby is allowed to die and the incident becomes known, the authorities often try to prosecute the doctor. This has happened several dozen times in the past eight years, most recently in the case of Dr. LaBenz, who is to go on trial in Omaha this fall on two counts of criminal abortion. But interviews with nurses, some of them visibly anguished, uncovered dozens of similar cases that never reached public attention.

In fact, for every case that does become known, a hundred probably go unreported. Dr. Willard Cates, an expert on medical statistics who is chief of abortion surveillance for the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, estimates that 400 to 500 abortion live births occur every year in the United States. That is only a tiny fraction of the nation's 1.5 million annual abortions. Still, it means that these unintended live births are literally an everyday occurrence.

They are little known because organized medicine, from fear of public clamor and legal action, treats them more as an embarrassment to be hushed up than a problem to be solved. "It's like turning yourself in to the IRS for an audit," Cates said. "What is there to gain? The tendency is not to report because there are only negative incentives."

One result of the medical community's failure to openly acknowledge the problem is that many hospitals and clinics give their staffs no guidelines for dealing with abortion live births. Even where guidelines exist, they may not be followed. The doctor is seldom present when a live birth occurs, because most late abortions—those done later than the midpoint of pregnancy—are performed by the injection of a solution (the method used in the Omaha case) that slowly induces delivery of the fetus many hours later. Crucial decisions therefore fall to nurses and physician residents with secondary authority over the case.

Signs of life in the baby may or may not be recognized. At some hospitals a live-born abortion baby is presumed dead unless it conspicuously demonstrates otherwise, by crying or waving its arms and legs. Even then, the medical personnel on the scene may let the baby die rather than try to save it.

Because they are premature, these infants need immediate care, including machine support, in order to live. Given such care, many can survive in good health, as did a pair of abortion babies born in separate incidents in Wilmington, Del., in the spring of 1979 and since adopted. Others are too premature to be saved even with the best care.

Whether they live or die, these abortion live births—and even successful, routine abortions of late-term, highly developed fetuses—are taking a heavy emotional toll on medical staffs across the country. Some physicians say they have "burned out" and have stopped doing abortions altogether. Nursing staffs at hospitals in Cleveland, Grand Rapids, Fort Lauderdale and elsewhere have rebelled at late abortions and have stopped their hospitals from performing any abortions later than the midpoint of pregnancy. Some staff members who regularly perform late abortions report having nightmares about fetuses, including recurring dreams in which they frantically seek to hide fetuses from others.

In legalizing abortion in 1973, the Supreme Court said it was reserving the right to protect the life of a viable fetus—that is, one with the potential to survive outside the womb. But the court never directly acknowledged the chance of an aborted fetus' being born alive. And it therefore never gave a clear guideline for dealing with what Dr. Thomas Kerenyi, a leading New York expert on abortions, has called "the dreaded complication."

Twenty states (including Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware) have no laws limiting late abortions or mandating care for live-born abortion babies. Even where such state laws exist, they have usually been found unenforceable in practice or unconstitutional.

"Everyone—doctors, attorneys, state legislators—is looking for some clear guidelines concerning disposition of these infants," said Newman Flanagan, district attorney for the City of Boston. "If a baby has rejected an abortion and lives, then it is a person under the Constitution. As such, it has a basic right to life. Unfortunately, it is difficult to protect that right, because there are no guidelines addressed to this specific issue."

Medical trends indicate that abortion live births will continue. They may even become more frequent. For one thing, demand for late-term abortions is undiminished, and with the growing popularity of genetic testing to screen for fetal defects midway through pregnancy, educated and affluent women are now joining the young, the poor and the uninformed who have been, until now, the main groups seeking late abortions.

Furthermore, estimating the gestational age of a fetus in the womb—a crucial aspect of a successful abortion—remains an inexact art. In March, doctors at the Valley Abortion Clinic in Phoenix estimated that one woman was 19 to 20 weeks pregnant; days after she delivered not an aborted fetus but a 2½-pound, 32-week baby. It survived after two months of intensive care at a Phoenix hospital.

Finally, medical science in the past 10 years has greatly improved its ability to care for premature babies. Infants are becoming viable earlier and earlier. Those with a gestational age of 24 weeks and weighing as little as 1½ pounds can now survive if given the best of care.

So long as doctors perform abortions up to the 24th week of pregnancy (as is legal everywhere in the United States under the 1973 Supreme Court ruling), it is statistically certain that some of these borderline cases will turn out to be viable babies, born alive. It happened again last May in Chicago—a 19-to-20-week estimate, a live-born 2-pound baby boy.

By ignoring the problem of abortion live births, the courts and the medical establishment are choosing to overlook a long, well-documented history of cases: January 1969, Stobhill Hospital, Glasgow, Scotland: A custodian heard a cry from a paper bag in the snow beside an incinerator. He found a live baby. It was taken inside and cared for in the hospital's operating theater but died nine hours later. The infant's gestational age had been estimated at 26 weeks by the physician performing the abortion. It was actually closer to 32 weeks. No efforts were made to check for signs of life before the aborted baby was discarded. No charges were filed. Because the case had been written about in British medical journals, it was a matter of record—before abortion was legalized in this country—that such things could happen.

April 1973, Greater Bakersfield Hospital, Bakersfield, Calif.: A 4½-pound infant was born live following a saline abortion (induced by an injection of salt solution) performed by Dr. Xavier Hall Ramirez. Informed by phone, Dr. Ramirez ordered two nurses to discontinue administering oxygen to the baby. His instructions were countermanded by another doctor; the baby survived and later was placed for adoption. Ramirez was indicted for solicitation to commit murder. His attorney argued that a medical order based on medical opinion, no matter how mistaken, is privileged. Dr. Irvin M. Cushner of the University of California at Los Angeles, later to become a top health policy official in the Carter administration, testified that it was normal for Ramirez to expect the delivery of a dead or certain-to-die infant as the result of a saline abortion.

July 1974, West Penn Hospital, Pittsburgh: Dr. Leonard Laufe performed an abortion on a woman who contended she had been raped—though that and her account of when she became pregnant were later disputed. She had been turned down for an abortion at another hospital, where the term of her pregnancy was estimated at 26 to 31 weeks. Laufe put it at 20 to 22. The abortion, induced by an injection of prostaglandin, a substance that stimulates muscle contraction and delivery of the fetus, was filmed for use as an instructional film. The film showed the three-pound infant moving and gasping. Also, a nurse and a medical student testified that they had noticed signs of life. No charges were filed, however, after a coroner's inquest at which Laufe testified that the infant sustained fatal damage during delivery.

February 1975, Boston: Dr. Kenneth Edelin was convicted of manslaughter for neglecting to give care to a 24-week infant after a 1973 abortion at Boston City Hospital. Witnesses said Edelin held the infant down, constricting the flow of oxygen through the umbilical cord and smothering it. He was the first and only American doctor ever convicted on charges of failing to care for an infant born during an abortion. The conviction was overturned by the Massachusetts Supreme Court on the ground that improper instructions had been given to the jury. Edelin and his lawyer argued that he had taken no steps to care for the infant because it was never alive outside the womb.

March 1977, Westminster Community Hospital, Westminster, Calif: A seven-month baby girl was born live after a saline abortion performed by Dr. William Waddill. A nurse testified that Waddill, when he got to the hospital, interrupted her efforts to help the baby's breathing. A fellow physician testified that he had seen Waddill choke the infant. "I saw him put his hand on this baby's neck and push down," said Dr. Ronald Cornelson. "He said, 'I can't find the —— trachea,' and 'This baby won't stop breathing.'" Two juries, finding Cornelson an emotional and unconvincing witness, deadlocked in two separate trials. Charges against Waddill were then dismissed. He had contended the infant was dying of natural causes by the time he got to the hospital.

July 1979, Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, Los Angeles: Dr. Boyd Cooper delivered an apparently stillborn infant, after having ended a problem pregnancy of 23 weeks. Half an hour later the baby made gasping attempts to breathe, but no efforts were made to resuscitate it because of its size (1 pound 2 ounces) and the wishes of the parents. The baby was taken to a small utility room that was used, among other things, as an infant morgue. Told of the continued gasping, Cooper instructed a nurse, "Leave the baby there—it will die." Twelve hours later, according to testimony of the nurse, Laura VanArsdale, she returned to work and found the infant still in the closet, still gasping.

Cooper then agreed to have the baby boy transferred to an intensive care unit, where he died four days later. A coroner's jury ruled the death "accidental" rather than natural but found nothing in Cooper's conduct to warrant criminal action.

A common thread in all these incidents is that life was recognized and the episode brought to light by someone other than the doctor. Indeed, there is evidence that doctors tend to ignore all but the most obvious signs of life in an abortion baby.

In the November 1974 newsletter of the International Correspondence Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, several doctors addressed a question from a practitioner who had written in an earlier issue that he was troubled by what to do when an aborted infant showed signs of life.

One was Dr. Ronald Bolognese, an obstetrician at Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, who replied:

"At the time of delivery, it has been our policy to wrap the fetus in a towel. The fetus is then moved to another room while our attention is turned to the care of [the woman]. She is examined to determine whether complete placental expulsion has occurred and the extent of vaginal bleeding. Once we are sure that her condition is stable, the fetus is evaluated. Almost invariably all signs of life have ceased."

(Bolognese recanted that statement in a 1979 interview. "That's not what we do now," he said. "We would transport it to the intensive care nursery.")

In addition, Dr. William Brenner of the University of North Carolina Medical School suggested that if breathing and movement persist for several minutes, "the patient's physician, if he is not in attendance should probably be contacted and informed of the situation. The pediatrician on call should probably be apprised of the situation if signs of life continue."

Dr. Warren Pearse, executive director of the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, was asked in a 1979 interview what doctors do, as standard practice, to check whether an aborted fetus is alive.

"What you would do next [after expulsion] is nothing," Pearse said. "You assume the infant is dead unless it shows signs of life. You're dealing with a dead fetus unless there is sustained cardiac action or sustained respiration—it's not enough if there's a single heartbeat or an occasional gasp."

These seemingly callous policies are based on the assumption that abortion babies are too small or too damaged by the abortion process to survive and live meaningful lives. That is not necessarily the case, though, even for babies set aside and neglected in the minutes after delivery.

A nursing supervisor who asked not to be identified told of an abortion live birth in the mid-70's in a Florida hospital. The infant was dumped in a bedpan without examination, as was standard practice. "It did not die," the nurse said. "It was left in the bedpan for an hour before signs of life were noticed. It weighed slightly over a pound.

The baby remained in critical condition for several months, but excellent care in a unit for premature infants enabled it to survive. The child, now 5 years old, was put up for adoption. The nursing supervisor, who has followed its progress, said she has pictures of the youngster "riding a bicycle and playing a little piano."

In the spring of 1979 two babies were born live, five weeks apart, after saline abortions at the Wilmington Medical Center. They were given vigorous care, survived and were later adopted. One had been discovered by a nurse, struggling for breath and with a faint heartbeat, after having been placed in a plastic specimen jar. The second was judged to be a live delivery and was given immediate help breathing.

A baby girl, weighing 1 pound 11 ounces, was born in February 1979 after a saline abortion at Inglewood (Calif.) Hospital. Harbor General Hospital, which is associated with UCLA and is fully equipped to care for premature babies, was called for help, but the neonatal rescue team did not respond. The infant died after three hours.

The Los Angeles Department of Health Services investigated and was told that there had been confusion over the baby's weight and that it reportedly showed poor vital signs. It was "very unusual for them not to pick up [an infant] of this size," Dr. Rosemary Leake of Harbor General told investigators.

The administrator of the New York abortion unit, asked what would be done for a live-born abortion baby, said, "The nurses have been trained in how to handle this. I'd like to think we would do everything to save it. But honestly I'm not sure."

These incidents together suggest that life in an aborted infant may or may not be recognized. If it is, supportive treatment may or may not be ordered.

Such incidents, when discovered, often provoke prosecutions. A few may seem something like murder at first blush. But on closer inspection the doctors' actions have been judged, time and again, not quite to fit the definition of a crime.

Nowhere was this more vividly shown than in the case of Dr. Jesse J. Floyd, who was indicted on charges of murder and criminal abortion by a grand jury in Columbia, S.C., in August 1975. The charges were the result of an abortion a year earlier of a baby that appeared to have a gestational age of 27 to 28 weeks. It weighed 2 pounds 5 ounces and lived for 20 days.

In October 1979 the state dropped its case against Floyd. County prosecutor James C. Anders later conceded in an interview that South Carolina's abortion law was of dubious constitutionality. "In the second place," he said, "I had a reluctant witness [the infant's mother]. That and the passage of time worked against me."

A detailed record was developed in the case, as part of a federal suit that Floyd brought against Anders in which he sought to block the state prosecution. The 20-year-old mother, Louise A., lived in the small town of Hopkins, worked at a military-base commissary and had plans to enroll in a technical college. Those plans made her unwilling to have the baby she was carrying, so she presented herself for an abortion at Floyd's office in July 1974. Court records indicate that she had been told erroneously by her hometown doctor's nurse that she was not pregnant, and that she only slowly realized that she was.

Floyd found her to be past the first trimester of pregnancy, and under South Carolina law that meant an in-hospital abortion would be required. There were delays in her raising $450 for the abortion and more delays in admitting her to Richland Memorial Hospital. She was injected with prostaglandin on Sept. 4 and expelled the live baby early on the morning of Sept. 6.

"I started having real bad labor pains again," Louise recalled in her deposition, "and finally my baby was born. I called the nurse. Then about four or five of them came in the room at the time. The head nurse came in the same time the other nurses came in and she told me did I know that the baby was a seven-month baby. I told her no.

"One of the nurses said that the baby was alive. They took the baby out of the room. He never did cry, he just made some kind of a noise.

The first doctor on the scene, paged from the cafeteria, was a young resident. She did not hesitate. On detecting a heartbeat of 100, she clamped and severed the umbilical cord and had the baby sent to the hospital's intensive care unit.

"It was a shock, a totally unique emergency situation, very upsetting to all of us," the doctor, who now practices in California, said in an interview. "Some people have disagreed with me [about ordering intensive care for an abortion live birth] but that seems to me the only way you can go.

"It's like watching a drowning. You act. You don't have the luxury of calling around and consulting. You institute life-preserving measures first and decide about viability later on."

Ten days after birth, the baby had improved markedly and was given a 50-50 chance of survival. Then he developed a tear in the small intestine and died of that and other complications on Sept. 26.

Louise A. never saw the child. She checked out of the hospital two days after the abortion and did not return. But she did show a passing interest in the baby's progress.

"I kept calling this nurse," Louise said in her deposition. "I would call . . . and get information from them about the baby, and they told me he was doing fine. They told me he had picked up two or three pounds. I started going to school, and one afternoon I called home and they told me the baby had died, but no one told me the cause of his death."

Floyd never saw the infant either. On the day of the abortion, his hospital privileges at Richland were withdrawn, and they have never been restored.

These circumstances presented prosecutor Anders with a difficult case. Floyd had had no physical contact with the live-born infant, nor was he issuing orders concerning its care. Nonetheless, Anders thought the doctor could be held responsible for the infant's death.

Anders pressed his murder charge using an old English common-law theory. Under this theory, willfully doing damage to a "vital" infant in the womb could be considered a crime against the fetus as a person. The abortion itself, Anders alleged, was an assault.

This line of argument is not entirely farfetched. For instance, a Camden, N.J., man was convicted of murder in 1975 after he shot a woman in the abdomen late in her pregnancy, causing the death of the twins she was carrying. But application of the theory to abortion had never been tested—in South Carolina or anywhere else.

South Carolina law in the mid-1970s prohibited third-trimester abortion unless two other doctors certified that the abortion was essential to protect the life or health of the mother. No such certifications were made for Louise. However, various Supreme Court rulings suggested that both the requirement of consultation with other doctors and the explicit definition of viability (as beginning in the third trimester) would make that law unconstitutional

Floyd's lawyers, George Kosko of Columbia. S.C., and Roy Lucas of Washington, also filed voluminous expert affidavits on the difficulty of estimating gestational age accurately. At worst, they argued, Floyd had made a mistaken diagnosis. What proof was there that he had intentionally aborted a viable baby?

District Court Judge Robert Chapman and the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals agreed that the prosecution was based on flimsy evidence and should be blocked. However, the Supreme Court disagreed, in a ruling in March 1979, and suggested that judgment should be withheld on constitutional matters until the state prosecution had run its course. The way was thus cleared for Anders to proceed, but with witnesses dispersed, memories fading and the legal basis for prosecution still doubtful, Anders chose to drop the case.

Floyd, 49, continues performing first-trimester abortions at his Ladies Clinic, but the loss of hospital privileges and the damage to his reputation caused his surgical practice to collapse, he said.

The long legal proceeding also seems to have had a chilling effect on abortion practice throughout South Carolina, which Anders concedes was one of his intentions.

"The main thing is the dilemma it puts the other physicians in," Floyd said in an interview. "It's just about dried up second-trimester abortions in this state. I have to send mine to Atlanta, Washington or New York."

Asked about late abortions and the risk of live births, Floyd said he thought abortions performed through the sixth month of pregnancy create "a problem to which there isn't an answer. We probably need to move back to 20 weeks. I would be reluctant to do one now after 20 weeks."

A similar case occurred about the same time in South Carolina, when Anders obtained a criminal indictment charging Dr. Herbert Schreiber of Camden, S.C., with first-degree murder and illegal abortion.

On July 18, 1976, a month after the charges had been filed, the 60-year-old doctor was found dead in a motel room in Asheville, N.C. A motel maid discovered the body slumped in a chair. Several bottles of prescription drugs were recovered from the room. Two days later the Buncombe County medical examiner ruled the death a suicide from a drug overdose.

Schreiber, who left no note, had pleaded not guilty to the charge of having killed a live baby girl after an abortion by choking or smothering her to death.

Comparing the Floyd and Schreiber cases, Anders found an irony: Schreiber "just reached in and strangled the baby," the prosecutor said his evidence showed. "I charged him with murder, and he committed suicide. If he had been willing to wait, he probably would have been OK too."●

ED DOWNEY HONORED BY THE ESSEX COUNTY, NJ GOVERNMENT

● Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. President, I am pleased today to recognize the accomplishments of Essex County, NJ, clerk of the Board of Elections for 25 years of service to Essex County.

Starting as an investigator, commissioner of registration and superintendent of elections, Mr. Downey advanced through the ranks to eventually become the commissioner of registration and superintendent of elections for the county of Essex, NJ. More recently, Ed was chosen to be the clerk of the Board of Elections for Essex County.

In these days when loyalty, diligence and job performance are not highlighted as often as needed, I want to cite Mr. Downey as an inspiration to young people who are about to enter the work force. Because of his outstanding service, the Essex County government is sponsoring a reception in his honor on Wednesday, April 16, 1986.

Mr. President, I am proud to join in honoring Ed Downey for his considerable accomplishments which have benefited many persons throughout the State of New Jersey. His efforts over the last 25 years stand as a testament to government which is both fiscally and socially responsible; government which works for the average American.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: SPEAKING OUT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today, I sent copies of past floor statements on Naum and Inna Meiman to the Soviet Embassy. It is essential that the Soviets understand the level of concern that we in the Congress express.

Yesterday's news conference with Olga Plam, Naum's daughter, Lisa Paul, the Meimans' young American friend and a number of Senators and Congressmen demonstrates the importance of the Meimans' case.

As Olga pleaded with the world to not forget those she left behind, I could not help but look around the room to see that Olga had moved us all. Lisa, the young women who went on a hunger strike to protest the Meimans' situation, made a brief statement which focused on the vitality of the Meimans. She broke into tears and could not continue.

The Meimans are beloved, old people who pose no threat to the Soviet state.

I urge the Soviets to grant the Meimans permission to emigrate to Israel.●

DAVID H. MALIN

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, leaders in every form of human endeavor are very rare. When their leadership is exercised in new fields and pioneering endeavors their loss is keenly felt.

This is certainly true of David Malin who died in Baltimore last Thursday. He was both a leader and a pioneer in the education of children with learning disabilities. He fully understood the great potential of such children and the necessity of recognizing their problems at an early age.

David Malin put his belief in children with learning disabilities to the test when he joined in the founding of Jemicy School. He was serving as director of the school at the time of his death.

Many young Americans who might have been shunted aside by the education system can now look forward to successful and fulfilling lives because of David Malin's work.

Mrs. Mathias and I share the sense of loss that is felt by all who know Jemicy School. We extend our sympathy to Mrs. Malin and to their son Michael.

I ask that an obituary that appeared in the Baltimore Sun on April 11, 1986 be printed in the RECORD.

The obituary follows:

DAVID H. MALIN DIES AT 45; WAS JEMICY SCHOOL DIRECTOR

A memorial service for David H. Malin, the director and one of the founders of the Jemicy School, will be at 11 a.m. Friday at the school, 11 Celadon Road in Owings Mills.

Mr. Malin, who was 45, died Thursday of cancer at his home in the 300 block of Northway. Graveside services were held yesterday at Beth Tfiloh Congregation cemetery.

In 1973, Mr. Malin was one of the founders of the school for children with dyslexia, an impairment of the ability to read. Originally called the School at Jemicy Farm, it moved from the farm to the quarters of the old Valley School shortly after its formation.

Earlier, he taught exceptional children in the Baltimore County school system, directed a model program for children with dyslexia in Prince George's County and taught in the Loyola College graduate program in addition to tutoring children privately.

He also served on the Governor's Commission for Dyslexia.

In 1983, he received the International Reading Association's Celebration of Literacy Award, and in 1973 was named an Outstanding Young Man of the year by the Baltimore Junior Chamber of Commerce.

Born in Baltimore, he was educated at the Talmudical Academy and City College. He earned a bachelor's degree at Towson State University and a master's degree at Loyola College.

He is survived by his wife, the former Judith Ann George; a son, Michael Malin, of Baltimore, and a brother, Jerald A. Malin, of Baltimore.

The family suggested that memorial donations could be made to the Jemicy School.●

THE TARGETED JOBS TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to bring to your attention the support and praise many New Mexicans have expressed for the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit Program. During a period of unprecedented Federal fiscal imbalance and consequent need to reduce spending, this job creation program is unique and welcomed. No expensive Government agency runs it. No excessive redtape lessens its effectiveness. Rather, the TJTC offers financial incentives in the form of tax credits to employers who hire a selected group of people who because of their age, education or other circumstances have a hard time getting a chance at a job. Let me say that I am an enthusiastic supporter of this job placement program.

The Targeted Jobs Tax Credit Program was implemented in 1978 to focus employment opportunities for groups in need of special incentives in order to be considered for employment, groups whose unemployment rates are traditionally above the national average.

The TJTC Program targets for employment of individuals from nine targeted groups. These groups are first, vocational rehabilitation referrals; second, economically disadvantaged youths age 18 through 24; third, economically disadvantaged Vietnam-era veterans; fourth, SSI recipients; fifth, general assistance recipients; sixth, economically disadvantaged cooperative education students age 16 through 19; seventh, economically disadvantaged former convicts; eighth, AFDC recipients and WIN registrants; ninth, economically disadvantaged summer youth employees age 16 or 17.

The credit generally equals 50 percent of the first $6,000 of qualified first year wages and 25 percent of the first $6,000 of qualified second year wages paid to a member of a target group. Thus, the maximum credit is $3,000 per individual in the first year of employment and $1,500 per individual in the second year of employment, or a maximum credit of $4,500 over a 2-year period. With respect to economically disadvantaged summer youth employees, however, the credit is equal to 85 percent of up to $3,000 of wages, for a maxium credit of $2,000. The employer's deduction for wages must be reduced by the amount of credit.

New Mexico placed 4,121 of its citizens in jobs in 1985 through the targeted jobs tax credit and 3,766 in 1984. The largest percentage of these placements have been in the categories of disadvantaged youth enrolled in cooperative education programs, disadvantaged youth age 18 to 24, AFDC recipients and exconvicts. In addition, the TJTC has been particularly effective in providing summer employment for disadvantaged youth.

In 1981, the Senate voted 95 to 3 to extend the TJTC Program for 1 year as a result of a Senate floor amendment offered by myself and my distinguished colleagues Senator HEINZ, Senator DOLE, Senator LONG, and 29 others. The program was extended again for 2 years under the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1984 [TEFRA] and for an additional year by the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

I have been a cosponsor and active supporter of the targeted jobs tax credit each time it has been considered for authorization. This includes the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, and the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

The targeted jobs tax credit expired on December 31, 1985. A 2-year extension was included in the Tax Reform Act, H.R. 3838, which has passed the House and now the Senate Finance Committee is considering tax reform. Since drafting major tax legislation is time consuming, this period of uncertainty must be eliminated in the interest of maintaining continuity for the taxpayer.

This credit must be extended because the TJTC is simple, effective, and an easily understood private enterprise stimulus that works to reduce structural unemployment. Employers under the program will take a chance on the target groups regardless of the associated higher training costs and employment risks, thus the program operates effectively to create preferential hiring practices. Small businesses have used TJTC because of its simplicity. State employment agencies in almost every State support TJTC, and in certain States, 50 percent of the Job Services' placements are related to TJTC.

The program is cost effective, because it drastically reduces welfare assistance and unemployment compensation to targeted groups. Since people are leaving welfare roles to become taxpayers, the TJTC benefits society without increasing Government spending.

The TJTC is an outstanding jobs program, but is dying a slow death. It has been in a state of limbo since December 31, 1985. It is different from other programs in similar situations because it is more sensitive to this loss of time. Businesses and community agencies who have become used to using it as a placement tool for the handicapped and disadvantaged are losing interest and confidence. The State employment agencies are dismantling their TJTC vouchering and certification structure and laying off or transferring TJTC personnel. TJTC, one of very few successful, cost efficient partnerships between business and Government, is in danger of extinction. Therefore, I suggest that immediate action be taken.●

THE "IMPACT '86" SPEECH OF SENATOR CHILES

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, on April 14, Senator CHILES delivered a major policy speech to the National Conference of the American Academy of Pediatrics. His topic was infant mortality and what needs to be done to conquer a threat still so common in the United States, that we rank 16th in the world in the number of children who die in infancy.

It was a hard-hitting talk, laced with facts and remarkable for the plan of action it proposes to reduce our infant mortality rate. Senator CHILES described his bill, S. 2288, entitled "IMPACT '86, the Infant Mortality Prevention Act of 1986." The bill would allow States, through Medicaid, to provide prenatal care to pregnant women with incomes below the poverty level and to their infants.

It was Senator CHILES who made sure $100 million was included in the Senate's version of the first concurrent budget resolution to provide room for this legislation itself.

It's clear from these actions and others that LAWTON CHILES has become one of the Nation's authentic leaders in the fight against infant mortality. His speech is both a comprehensive assessment of the problem, and a strategic blueprint for action.

I commend it to my colleagues as the best statement I've read on one of the Nation's most damaging problems. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR LAWTON CHILES AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF PEDIATRICS

Thank you for your invitation. I'm very pleased to be with you today.

Some years ago, I was blessed with a miraculous grandson.

He was more than five months early, and weighed less than two pounds. Today, he's strong and healthy. And my family and I will always be thankful for the pediatricians and neonatologists who watched over him.

Still, I know in my heart—and his doctors agreed—there was something more in that boy that saved him. He came back to us even when his doctors told us his chances were all but gone.

We were fortunate to have the doctors with us. And we were fortunate for the unseen hand that saved him.

Yet others have met tragedy.

Today, we still hear—much too often—the echoes of this ancient Greek question: "Can you find in human life any greater suffering than to see your children dead?"

I know those are stark words. But they have been asked so often in this country by people from all walks of life.

Abraham Lincoln—murdered this day in 1865—lost an 11-year-old son to diptheria. Calvin Coolidge lost his son to a blood infection. And John Kennedy's son, Patrick, lived just 48 hours.

Even today in the United States—the richest and most advanced nation on earth—at least ten births out of every 1000 leave parents asking that same painful question: Is there any greater suffering?

Those stricken parents must live with the answer all their lives. But the rest of us have other questions to answer.

For example, why is it that the United States still ranks 16th on the list of infant mortality—on a par with Singapore?

Why is it that newborn black children are twice as likely to die in infancy as white children?

And why is it that despite improvements over the years, death rates for babies who survive the first month of life are rising?

Maybe it will never be possible to isolate a single cause. Certainly the evidence suggests that prenatal care for more mothers needs serious improvement. But for the third year in a row, the percentage of women not getting that care has increased.

And when the figures show that American infants of low-birthweight are 40 times more likely to die in the neonatal period than normal infants, we can't help but be alarmed by the persistently high number of low-birthweight infants born in the United States.

The physicians of this country have been able to work wonders over the last 25 years. The rate of infant mortality has fallen dramatically. Right here in Florida, we have gone from nearly 30 deaths per 1000 births in 1960 down to less than 11 in 1984.

The downward trend must continue. It seems to me that the path to follow is to bring the medical genius of the nation to more and more people. But around the nation, we seem to have run into a barrier that keeps proper care during pregnancy from the reach of too many women.

If we can't penetrate that barrier, the nation will pay a cruel price in lost lives and limited futures. The mothers without care will pay a price. The children who survive a difficult birth without access to good neonatal care will pay a price of their own.

And the nation will pay as well.

Children without proper nutrition and health care begin life with restrictions. Schooling becomes hard. Many drop out. The cycle of poverty takes over, leaving them out of the mainstream of American life. There seem to be more opportunities to go wrong than to move ahead. And the nation loses twice—in remedial, welfare, and correctional costs—and in squandered minds.

I'm not saying there's a universal link between children who fail and the lack of good care for infants and mothers. But I do suggest that the more healthy children we can bring to life in this nation, the better the nation's life can be.

Last September, I proposed legislation in the Senate to create a National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality. It would serve for just one year. And it would not try to reinvent the wheel.

The Commission's aim would be to review current state and federal efforts to prevent infant mortality. It would be charged to report legislative steps, to coordinate and improve on what's been done so far.

Medicine in this nation has worked wonders for so many. What we face now is the question of what can be done to help reach others in need.

In Washington, I serve as the ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee. So, better than most, I recognize the limits the federal deficit imposes on spending choices.

The Administration's budget request for Maternal and Child Health would not even provide enough for the current level of service. Community health and migrant health programs would vanish into block grants at lower levels of funding. And the National Institute for Child Health would end up with $11 million less next year than it received last year.

Deficits forced those choices. And they are the wrong choices.

Poor families with meager resources try and make choices that will save them money in the future. They try and plan ahead—to put something away for the hardest times—but also to invest what they have to keep those hard times away.

The high level of infant mortality demands we make those same choices. We must act now to give our children and their mothers a better chance.

So as a parent, a grandparent, and as a member of the Budget Committee it's clear to me that preventive investment is essential at both the humane level, and at the financial level.

In March, we reported a budget in the Senate that includes room for a $100 million initiative in the Medicaid program. It would be used to target preventive health care service to low-income pregnant women and their infants.

The budget itself does not make the necessary changes in federal law to achieve the goal. But it would fence off the funds to help us begin.

In this time of budget austerity, we've got to work even harder to find ways to achieve long-range savings. Putting aside money for pregnant women and newborn children is that kind of investment. Inattention to these needs in the past has been costly. What we need is the small dose of prevention to avoid major spending on cures later—the kind of cures that would be necessary to help children damaged in infancy because they had no access to proper care.

I have seen compelling figures from right here in my own state about the value of investing in prevention.

On average, the cost of prenatal care in a normal pregnancy is around $600. But the cost of intensive care for a low-birthweight infant can be as much as $120,000.

Pediatricians do incredible work saving the newborn. But it seems to me there's a great deal more that must be done to safeguard the unborn. We must reach more and more pregnant women with better and better care to help them bring healthier babies into the world.

Last week, I introduced legislation to put the flesh on the bones of the budget initiative.

Let me tell you something about it.

I want to strengthen the Medicaid program so all low-income, pregnant women can have decent prenatal care. And their children—through the first year of their life—can have decent health care. Even if they aren't covered by health insurance. And even if they have incomes lower than necessary to pay for it. Our goal is to make this special maternity benefit available to all women with family incomes below the Federal poverty standard—a standard now set at about $8,800 for a family of three. We may have to start out on a smaller scale—targeting those with family incomes only one-half that amount.

If a state chooses to implement maternity coverage for this special group, the federal government would match their expenses at the same overall Medicaid rate, somewhere between 50 and 80 percent of the total cost.

Right now, Medicaid coverage is tied to state eligibility standards for AFDC. If an individual's income is low enough to qualify for AFDC, Medicaid's also provided.

In many states, however, the payment standard for AFDC is too low to bring health care insurance to the thousands of women and children who need it. And many of those are the same states with the highest levels of infant mortality. It's incredible when you realize that 20 States now do not even have a standard high enough to provide health care to pregnant women with incomes at half the poverty level.

The bill would require all health insurance coverage through Medicaid to be available solely on the basis of need, rather than tied to welfare.

Beyond that, the coverage wouldn't be dependent on accumulating large medical bills to qualify for Medicaid. As things stand now, a low-income woman has to show huge medical bills to qualify for the Medicaid program. This in itself discourages the woman from seeking crucial prenatal care because she can't afford the bill in the first place. The preventive guidance so important in early pregnancy never reaches her.

So those are the basic contours of what the plan would do. But no one knows better than you do that one bill or a specified amount of money will not solve all the problems.

It won't solve the problems of complicated pregnancies. It won't take care of the mother's pre-existing health conditions. It's not a cure all. But it's a firm step forward.

Obviously medicine can do only so much. Unwanted pregnancies among the young and unmarried, nutrition problems, and the prevalence of drugs are all threats to the life of the unborn child.

Nothing the federal government can do alone—nothing the state governments can do alone—can solve all the problems.

But the one thing that's clear is that no matter what we do, you're the ones who will make the difference. Your skills and lifetime dedication to giving children the best chance is the critical factor.

For 56 years, the American Academy of Pediatrics has held fast to its founding ideals: helping children attain their full potential for physical, emotional and social health.

During my 15 years in the Senate, you have worked hard to push forward research and learning on maternal and child health, biomedical research and child nutrition.

Your advice has helped children make progress. Your initiative has made policy makers see the light. And your imagination and persistence can help us all see the future. I am grateful to all of you—to our own pediatricians in Florida and those of you from all throughout the country—for your leadership.

So, I'm not here to lecture. I only want to make it clear that the work you do has willing allies throughout society.

Louis Pasteur once described two contrary laws he saw at work in the world. One was the "law" of the battlefield and death. The other was the law of peace and health.

Of the second law, Pasteur wrote that science must try, "by obeying the law of humanity, to extend the frontiers of life."

It is this law you have sworn to uphold. It is the law of the children. And it is the law of hope for all of us.

Thank you very much.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I am proud to be a participant in the 1986 Congressional Call to Conscience. This program highlights the plight of Soviet Jews. Today, I would like to call attention to one woman's plight. It is the case of Nadezhda Fradkova.

Nadezhda, who is now 39, first applied for permission to emigrate to Israel in 1978. The reasons given for her denial reveal the lack of good faith on the part of the Soviet authorities. They maintained that she could not be allowed to emigrate because her father had access to State secrets. In reality, her parents divorced when she was an infant, and Nadezha has never met her father.

To protest the continued denial of her right to emigrate, Nadezhda resorted to the only weapon at her disposal, the hunger strike. She began several during 1983 and 1984. However, each time she began a hunger strike, she was forcibly taken to a hospital where she was force-fed.

Despite her advanced science degrees, Nadezhda was refused all but the most menial work. In 1984, she was arrested and charged with parasitism although she had tried unsuccessfully to find employment. She was harassed by the police and the KGB in the process. The subsequent treatment she received was horrendous.

Nadezhda was checked in and out of psychiatric institutions. Whenever she tried to register complaints about her treatment by waging hunger strikes, she was force-fed. She spent periods in complete isolation. To break her spirit, she was injected with massive dosages of drugs which left her paralyzed and barely conscious.

Following her stay in the psychiatric hospital, Nadezhda was transferred directly to a labor camp. She has been denied visitation rights. No word has been received from her since she was taken there.

As Americans, we must stand up and take notice of the injustice that is being perpetrated against our fellow human beings. We must not turn our backs on the suffering of countless Soviet Jews. Anatoly Shcharansky is free, but there are many like him who were left behind. This country was founded on the premise that no one should be oppressed or persecuted because of his or her religion. I call on the Soviet Union to give religious freedom to its Jews and other religious denominations, and to let Nadezhda Fradkova go free.●

Mr. DOLE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are still in morning business.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 426) to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection to electric consumers.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 1790

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 1792

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] proposes an amendment numbered 1792.

Add the following new section to S. 426 at the end thereof:

Sec. (—.) Section 211(c)(2)(B) of the Federal Power Act is amended by adding before the period the following: "provided, nothing in this subparagraph shall prevent an application for an order hereunder to be filed prior to termination or modification of an existing rate schedule, provided that such order shall not become effective until termination of such rate schedule or the modification becomes effective."

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Idaho, the chairman of the Energy Committee, and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, the ranking member of the Energy Committee, for their patience and cooperation.

I think with this amendment we have taken a step forward, to partially correct the inadequacies that some of the public utilities and small privately owned utilities find themselves in on dealing with the opportunity for applying for wheeling orders.

That was my goal and without the cooperation of the two distinguished Senators it would have been very difficult, probably impossible, to obtain.

I appreciate the cooperation of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky in examining the amendment and participating in its drafting.

I hope the amendment can be accepted.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I wish to ask the distinguished chairman of the Energy Committee and manager of the bill a question or two. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. FORD. It is my understanding that this amendment deals only—and I repeat, only—with the ability of a utility to file an application for wheeling prior to the termination of a rate schedule. It does not authorize any wheeling order to be issued and go into effect in violation of section 211(c)(2)(B). It does not provide a basis for termination of a rate schedule.

The only thing this does is clarify that an applicant does not have to wait until a rate schedule actually terminates before filing.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is perfectly and absolutely correct. This is only a procedural clarification that an application can be filed prior to a rate schedule terminating. No wheeling order could go into effect until the rate schedule on file is terminated pursuant to its terms and by order of FERC. This is not an opportunity to abrogate contracts and rate schedules.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished floor manager an additional question. May I inquire as to whether this provides any modification or change to the standards under section 206 or 205?

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. Absolutely not. The same standards and criteria which apply now would continue to apply.

Mr. FORD. I thank the distinguished Senator for answering my questions and entering into the colloquy. I have been able to learn how to count tonight.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I want to underscore what was just said. The standards, the criteria, the procedure by which a termination is sought or a modification of a rate schedule under section 205 or 206 are changed in absolutely no way, with the single exception of it being in order to file application for wheeling before the termination or modification of a rate schedule. It does not affect the substance, it affects the time.

Second, it should also be clarified absolutely in the RECORD at this point that this amendment does not change the standards, the process, the criteria, by which a wheeling order is judged or processed. Those are absolutely unaffected and would go in every respect as existing law, with the single exception that a wheeling order could be applied for while a rate schedule was in effect and prior to the termination or modification of that rate schedule. But there is no interrelationship between the wheeling and the modification or termination which are separate issues under separate provisions of the law.

I am happy to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, let me say I agree totally with my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Energy Committee. He is right that this makes no substantive change. The rules of the road, in effect, are not changed at all. Indeed, I wonder, there must be some hidden significance of this amendment, because it seems as though it is much ado about nothing for this many hours of working with the Senate. Nevertheless, we will not object to it largely because we think it has very little effect. It simply allows you to make the application a little earlier than you otherwise could and that is, I believe, all that it does. The wheeling order, if it were granted, could not take effect until after the termination took effect or until the modification was ordered. So, Mr. President, we will not object to the amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I certainly agree with the statement of the Senator from Louisiana with respect to the effect of this amendment. And I also want to add further that a utility can request a wheeling order which is contingent upon obtaining a modification of a rate schedule. The fact that the modification is requested and granted, however, only would permit a wheeling order for the amount of power which was freed up by the modification. In effect, section 211(c)2(b) would no longer apply to that increment, although it would continue to apply to any energy which continues to be provided under the modified rate schedule on file.

Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Montana if it is not his understanding that the discussion that we have here with respect to the effects of the amendment are correct.

Mr. MELCHER. Yes, the discussion which I have listened to with attention between the Senator from Kentucky, Senator FORD, and the distinguished chairman and Senator JOHNSTON from Louisiana is my understanding of the purpose of the amendment.

I might say that, in the narrow context that we sought some relief for the captive public utilities or the captive small utilities, it is a small step forward. And that is what we sought to do. And while it may appear to have been only a small step, that is exactly what it is. It is a small step. But I am very pleased we were able to reach this agreement and I thank again my colleague.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would say the amendment is acceptable to the manager of the bill on this side of the aisle and I think the Senator from Louisiana has indicated it is acceptable to him as well. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1792) was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, it is my understanding the Senator from Montana has no further amendments to offer to the bill.

Mr. MELCHER. If the Senator will yield to me, the Senator is absolutely correct. I have no further amendments to offer.

Mr. McCLURE. Then I will say to all Members that there are no further amendments to be offered or considered. There are a couple of procedural matters and some colloquys to put in the RECORD at this time. It will be my intention, then, if it is agreeable with the majority leader, to complete all action up to the third reading of the bill and the rollcall for the third reading of the bill and ask that the rollcall occur tomorrow.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have serious concerns about the environmental consequences of an amendment adopted last Friday. In an attempt to mitigate the effects of the PURPA provisions of the bill on those individuals or groups who have made substantial financial investments and commitments in small hydro projects, the language grandfathers many projects that could create problems for the rivers of this country. It could affect fisheries, water and stream flows, animal habitats and certain plant species. This is an unfortunate result from a noble gesture. We must find a solution. Does the manager agree that the language adopted to section 10, grandfathering applications, creates potential difficulties for the environmental community?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes; I do.

Mr. HATFIELD. Given the lateness of the hour and the press of the legislative schedule, it appears impossible to craft an acceptable amendment to resolve this issue. I would ask the assurances of the managers of this legislation that this specific problem can be addressed during conference. So I ask: Is it your understanding that reasonable efforts will be made to correct this perceived problem in conference?

Mr. McCLURE. That is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is this Senator's opinion that we should work toward a resolution which would limit the grandfather to, first, those projects that have been accepted for filing prior to the enactment of this legislation, or second, those that the license applicant has demonstrated to the satisfaction of FERC that the requirements under the second stage of consultation set forth in FERC's prefiling consultation requirements have been adequately met. This, of course, assumes that there is an understanding that certain accommodations must be made for applications submitted prior to the implementation of FERC's new prefiling consultation requirements. Is it the manager's belief that such a structure may be a possible resolution to this controversy?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes, every effort will be made to resolve this issue; and I will work with you in the conferences to address the legitimate environmental concerns which have been raised.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I would like to clarify the intent of the amendment made by section 3 of the pending bill to section 10(a) of the Federal Power Act by directing an inquiry to a principal sponsor of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, and to my distinguished colleague from Washington State who has been of great assistance in developing this bill. I raise this inquiry because I believe there will be situations, including many in my own State where there has not yet been a lot of hydroelectric or other river development, where enhancement measures may not be appropriate. I am simply seeking assurance that this amendment cannot be read to require enhancement measures in every case without exception; but rather that the intent is simply to assure that enhancement measures are considered when such measures are appropriate and justified taking into account all of the site-specific economic and environmental circumstances.

Mr. WALLOP. I would like to give the Senator from Alaska those assurances since it is also my understanding that the intent of this provision is to ensure that the FERC considers fish and wildlife enhancement measures, adopting them where appropriate when they can be environmentally and economically justified given the scope of the project and the nature of the affected environment.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Senator EVANS, can you confirm my understanding that the adjective "adequate" as used in the amendment made by section 3(a) qualifies the terms "mitigation" and "enhancement" as well as the term "protection," so that revised section 10(a) of the Federal Power Act will ensure that a license issued under the act will provide for adequate protection, adequate mitigation, and when appropriate and justified, adequate enhancement of fish and wildlife, given the scope of the project and the nature of the affected environment.

Mr. EVANS. The Senator from Alaska is correct. In pertinent part, section 10(a) of the Federal Power Act, as amended by S. 426, requires an applicant to include such provisions as, in the judgment of the Commission, are best adapted to the comprehensive development of water resources, including the adequate protection, mitigation, and enhancement of fish and wildlife. The provision imposes on a project applicant responsibility to protect, mitigate, and enhance fish and wildlife only to the extent these resources are affected by the development and operation of the project or projects in question.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I believe, before we are ready to go to final passage, the committee amendment, as amended, must be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLURE. I move the committee amendment, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the rollcall vote on final passage of S. 426, the hydroelectric bill, occur at 11:30 a.m., on tomorrow, and that paragraph 4 of rule XII be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on final passage of S. 426.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m., on Thursday, April 17, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes each for special orders: Senator HAWKINS, Senator CRANSTON, Senator WILSON, Senator DIXON, Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator CHILES, Senator LEVIN, Senator RIEGLE, Senator BAUCUS, Senator GORE, and Senator PROXMIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 11:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as just agreed to, the vote on final passage will occur at 11:30 a.m. Immediately following the vote it will be the intention of the majority leader to turn to S. 1923, the Bankruptcy Judges bill.

I understand that might be completed in 2 or 3 hours. There are amendments. I understand there are no objections to taking it up.

We have completed action on the Federal Deposit Insurance Act; on the extensions.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is quite right in his request.

The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Chair.

Following the bankruptcy bill, I hope we can complete action on the technical amendments to the crime bill.

So there will be rollcall votes tomorrow. I hope we are not in too late tomorrow evening.

If we can complete action on these items, I think I can assure Members there will be no votes on Friday. If we are in session, maybe we can lay down the budget resolution, or lay something down, and have opening statements.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

I hope that the Senate can complete action on the measures which have been identified by the distinguished majority leader.

I hope we would then be able to call up the budget for opening statements, at least.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I say to the minority leader that I am not certain we will call up the budget. We have a meeting scheduled for, I think, around noon on Friday with the Speaker to discuss the budget.

I have written a letter to the Speaker, for myself and Congressman MICHEL, and asked him to meet with the two of us, along with Senator DOMENICI, and Senator HATFIELD.

That meeting probably will not take too long. But in any event, I think there are a number of Members asking about votes on Friday.

We are almost certain that there will be no votes. I think we will be in a position, hopefully, by 1 o'clock tomorrow to affirm that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I apologize to the Member on this side who indicated earlier that he would not be available for the 11:30 vote. He will not be available until around noon. It may be that tomorrow morning, if nobody else objects, we might slip that vote to 11:45, or to 12 noon. But I will wait until tomorrow morning.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order just entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and at 11:03 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, April 17, 1986, at 10 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

KILDEE HONORS CALVARYMEN QUARTET'S 30TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues and the Nation a recognition ceremony that will be held Saturday, April 19, in Flint, MI, honoring the Calvarymen Quartet. The nationally renowned gospel group is being honored in conjunction with the celebration of its 30th anniversary at Flint's beautiful Whiting Auditorium.

The Calvarymen Quartet, also known as "Michigan's Ambassadors of Goodwill," began their career in 1956. Since that time they have recorded over 30 albums and have traveled almost 2 million miles singing and performing in 42 States and in three different countries. The group, consisting of Mr. Chuck Glasco, Mr. Jim Glasco, Mr. Dan Grimshaw, Mr. John Grimshaw, Mr. Bruce Hooker, and Mr. Irv Waddlington, has been extremely generous in donating their time and talents for special causes. They have benevolently performed in prisons, high schools, telethons, and in many other charity programs. Through the international language of music, the Calvarymen have spread joy and goodwill to many different audiences of greatly diverse backgrounds and nationalities. The group has given freely of their talents and has served to inspire and uplift the human spirit of those who have witnessed their finely tuned skills. The people of the Seventh Congressional District of Michigan are very proud and honored to claim the Calvarymen as their own.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to the Calvarymen in recognition of 30 outstanding years of dynamic community leadership. I would like to congratulate these ambassadors of goodwill and offer my sincere best wishes for future success.

A TRIBUTE TO HAROLD A. HAUTER

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress, I have the privilege of representing nearly one-half million people. This job has many challenges and many rewards. One of the greatest pleasures is knowing people like Harold A. Hauter.

Next week in my district, Harold Hauter is being honored at a State of Israel Bonds Tribute Dinner. Beyond the work Harold has done for the State of Israel, he is also being recognized for a long and distinguished career in the labor movement.

Harold is retiring this year as executive secretary and treasurer of the Maumee Valley District Council of Carpenters. But Harold has been more than just a respected and influential labor leader in northwest Ohio, as is evidenced by this Israeli Bonds Dinner. For me, Harold has always been an adviser, supporter, and above all, a friend. His word has always been his bond. Throughout my time as a public official, I have been fortunate to have the steady, insightful, and reassuring counsel of Harold Hauter.

Though I know our community will miss him as an active union official, I am certain his wisdom will still be heard even in retirement. I know that I will always rely on Harold when I need a straightforward, honest assessment of a particular concern facing our area or the Nation. Because of Harold's dedication to his trade union, I am confident he has layed a solid foundation for an even brighter future for our local carpenters. He has built his union with the same skills and pride he utilized on the job site.

To Helen, his lovely wife of 39 years, his children and grandchildren, I say on behalf of the entire Ninth District, thank you for sharing Harold with us. He has made a difference in his union. his church, his community, his State, and his Nation. Harold has helped make life better for others at home and abroad. What greater tribute can be made.

I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in congratulating Harold on being recognized by the State of Israel and wish him well in retirement. Harold Hauter deserves only the best.

A HIBAKUSHA'S PLEA

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was honored by the visit of Mr. Senji Yamaguchi, a survivor of the bomb dropped by the United States on Nagasaki.

Mr. Yamaguchi, though scarred by the effects of the bomb, did not come to speak about himself; he came to speak out for a comprehensive test ban. It is a message he has carried around the world, including the Soviet Union. Since we will soon be debating and voting on an amendment to cut off funds for nuclear testing, thereby imposing a comprehensive test ban, I would like to enter into the RECORD a copy of a statement brought by Mr. Yamaguchi.

This statement, drafted by the primary advocacy organization for Hibakusha—atomic bomb survivors—calls on the United States to stop nuclear testing and take this important step toward insuring "no more Hibakusha." It is a message I strongly endorse and I urge my colleagues to read the following statement:

STATEMENT ON THE NUCLEAR TEST AT NEVADA

(By Nihon Hidankyo)

On April 10, in Nevada, USA, a nuclear test was purposefully carried out, contrary to world public opinion which has demanded the abolishment of nuclear weapons. We "Hibakusha (Atomic Bomb Survivors)," cannot help having profound grief and anger about this test.

The United Nations has proclaimed this year the "Year of Peace" and world public opinion has sincerely asked for the prevention of nuclear war and the elimination of atomic weapons.

Last year, on the 40th anniversary of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Nihon Hidankyo (Japan Confederation of A- and H-bomb Sufferers Organizations) set delegations to five nuclear power nations, and requested each leader to abolish nuclear weapons. Since then Mr. Gorbachev, Secretary General of the Soviet Union, has proposed the elimination of atomic weapons. A U.S.-Soviet summit meeting was fulfillment of the Hibakusha's hope of "no more 'Hibakusha.'"

This U.S. resolve to test nuclear weapons crushes our hope.

Today, upon the departure of a "Hibakusha" delegation to speak in various U.S. cities, we strongly urge that the U.S. government deeply reflect upon this nuclear test, and begin making every effort to conclude an international agreement abolishing nuclear weapons.

Furthermore, we also request the Soviet Union not to resume their nuclear testing as a reaction to the irrational U.S. nuclear test.

NATIONAL DIABETES MONTH

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Congressman ALAN B. MOLLOHAN of West Virginia, and I are introducing a joint resolution to designate the month of November 1986 as National Diabetes Month. I am greatly pleased by the opportunity to introduce this laudable resolution for the fourth consecutive year.

The continuing battle against diabetes has yielded significant and impressive advances in basic and clinical research aimed at prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of those who have this disease. However, much more remains to be done.

Eleven million Americans suffer from diabetes. It is most distressing that a sizable portion of the victims of diabetes do not even know of their illness. The friends and families of those with this disease—literally tens of millions of Americans—are personally and often tragically affected by the consequences of diabetes on their loved ones. As a result of diabetes, we spend more than $14 billion each year on health care, disability payments, and premature mortality costs.

Diabetes and related health complications affect many bodily functions and organs. The lasting effects of such complications are quite severe. Among the problems detailed by the National Diabetes Report Groups are:

Diabetes causes almost 50 percent of foot and leg amputations among adults;

Diabetes is a leading cause of new cases of adult blindness and of kidney failure;

Diabetes is a major cause of birth defects and infant mortality;

The United States ranks among the five nations with the highest incidence of diabetes-related mortality;

Diabetes is a major cause of cardiovascular disease;

Persons with diabetes spend twice as many days in hospitals as persons without this disease;

Diabetes, which is the fourth leading cause of visits to general and family practice physicians, places a severe drain on our Nation's health resources;

And insulin-dependent diabetes afflicts 1 in every 600 children.

Diabetes is particularly prevalent among Hispanic-Americans, native Americans, black Americans, and women. Indeed, women are victims twice as often as men and blacks are victims twice as often as whites.

Mr. Speaker, by designating November 1986 as National Diabetes Month, this Congress can focus the attention on the American people on the human and economic costs of diabetes. I am personally aware of the consequences of diabetes, in general, and, sadly, juvenile diabetes, in particular. An increased understanding of this disease—by those directly affected and by others—might lead to greater research efforts, improved methods of preventing serious complications, new methods of treatment, and general awareness of the challenge we must face in treating and finally eliminating diabetes.

I sincerely urge the speedy adoption of this joint resolution. In addition, I would like to acknowledge the superb role performed by the American Diabetes Association in seeking the prevention, detection, and treatment of diabetes.

H.J. RES. 602

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas diabetes with its complications kills more people than any other disease cancer and cardiovascular disease;

Whereas diabetes afflicts 11,000,000 Americans, of whom 5,000,000 are not aware of their illness;

Whereas diabetes costs the Nation more than $14,000,000,000 annually in health care costs, disability payments, and premature mortality costs;

Whereas up to 85 percent of all cases of non-insulin dependent diabetes may be prevented through greater public understanding, awareness, and education;

Whereas diabetes is particularly prevalent among black Americans, Hispanic Americans, native Americans, and women; and

Whereas diabetes is a leading cause of blindness, kidney disease, heart disease, stroke, birth defects, and lower life expectancy, incidences of which may be reduced through greater patient and public education about diabetes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of November 1986 is designated as "National Diabetes Month". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

TOWARD A STRONGER DEFENSE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 15, 1986 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

TOWARD A STRONGER DEFENSE

Most Members of Congress would agree that major improvements are needed in the way we formulate our national security objectives, organize our military establishment and acquire our weapons. The U.S. defense effort is an enormous and complex enterprise, which poses unique challenges in planning for an uncertain future in a dangerous world, responding to security threats, and applying our technological and industrial capabilities and resources. Several reforms are needed for a stronger defense.

DEFINING SECURITY OBJECTIVES

The national debate on defense usually centers on how much should be spent, rather than on what is purchased, why it is needed, and how well funds are spent. There is no sound system whereby the President and Congress agree on strategic objectives, a military strategy to carry out the objectives, and necessary funding in the context of our overall economy and other competing claims for resources.

A root cause of our defense spending problems is the absence of clear guidance from the top about where and how America should be prepared to fight. If we don't know what we want to do, we can't plan how to do it. The task is to get the defense debate, which is always lively and sometimes acrimonious, to focus more on strategy, operations and force structure needed for the national security. Defense planning should begin with a comprehensive statement of objectives and priorities. Multi-year budgets should reflect a clear military strategy to achieve the objectives. The temptation has been to embrace an ambitious, global strategy that amounts to little more than the total demands of all of the armed services. My sense is that our military forces are asked to do too much in too many places with too little. U.S. forces are simply stretched too thin.

The defense debate in recent years has been less about defense than about the size of the defense budget. We have avoided tough choices among strategies and weapons, seeking to have them all. I am encouraged that, with budgets getting tighter, the terms of the debate are changing. Both those who favor more money for defense and those who favor less must speak precisely to the strategic consequences of their views.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS

There is growing doubt in the Congress whether our military forces, as currently structured, can adequately respond to a broad spectrum of threats, ranging from low level warfare to an extended war. The problem is not funding, but organization. My view is that the Defense Department's present organization is not well adapted to the challenges that confront us.

The integrated battlefield is a military reality. Modern warfare requires cooperation among the services and integration of command. The President needs military advice that better integrates the views of the nation's combat commanders. A former Defense Secretary complains that Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) recommendations are "designed to protect the institutional interests of each of the separate services." The JCS chairman lacks authority to mediate service rivalries or to articulate a national strategy. He does not even control the joint staff. Today he has only the power of persuasion, and disputes are often left unsettled. If the Navy wants one plane and the Army wants another, the Joint Chiefs are apt to approve both. One proposed reform would designate the JCS chairman as the principal military advisor to the President. Another would give our warfighting commanders a greater say in military planning and resource allocation. I favor both reforms.

DEFENSE ACQUISITION

The defense acquisition system is the largest business enterprise in the world, with annual purchases by the Defense Department of almost $170 billion, and 165,000 employees to manage it. It involves 15 million contract actions each year. This system has basic and severe problems. Our weapons cost too much, take too long to develop, and are often obsolete by the time they are in the field. A spate of horror stories—overpriced spare parts, test failures, cost and schedule overruns—has prompted Members of Congress to ask what can be done to end these practices. They point out, for example, that private industry can develop a multi-billion dollar program, such as a satellite or a transport airplane, in half the time and at less cost than it takes the Pentagon to develop a comparable military system. The public has been deeply distressed that billions of defense dollars have been wasted. Fundamental changes are needed at all levels of the weapons procurement process.

Common sense is the key element in a successful acquisition system. Under the present system, it appears that no one is in charge. One official, should be appointed with full responsibility for all acquisitions. Extensive testing must be done well before production decisions are made, and those who design a new weapon should not be responsible for testing it. Weapons that appear too costly should be stopped outright. Where commercial items are available, the Pentagon should not insist on customized products. The Pentagon should follow the buying practices of major private corporations, stressing quality and proven performance as well as price. The costs of weapons must be determined accurately. Today contractors are allowed to obtain long-term procurements with unrealistic price projections. Contractors should also bear some financial responsibility for cost overruns. Competitive bidding should be used whenever possible. I am impressed by the relentless consistency with which the Pentagon and industry resist competition. Awarding contracts to at least two companies, known as dual sourcing, could also save money. The Pentagon's buying process is overstaffed; many of them could be released without any apparent risk to national security.

The real challenge is to reform the way the military spends its billions. If the Pentagon squanders money on expensive weapons, it will squander the public support that is crucial for defense. If we can dispel the climate of waste and mismanagement, defense will not only have more money, but it will also have more fighting strength.

KNOW YOUR COUNTRY

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, members of the Pennsylvania International Heritage Society have been part of the national effort over the past few years to raise funds to refurbish the Statue of Liberty. On Saturday, April 19, 1986, the society will host a fundraising dinner at St. Ann's Church in Steelton, PA. The theme for the dinner is "Know Your Country." Proceeds from the dinner will go to the Statute of Liberty Fund.

Mr. Speaker, I bring this to the attention of my colleagues not only because I want to shed light on the hard work and efforts of the Pennsylvania International Heritage Society on behalf of our lady of liberty, but also to recognize another very special lady for whom the dinner has been dedicated—Mary Barnum Bush Hauck.

Mary Barnum Bush Hauck has dedicated her entire life to the music world as an educator, instructor, piano manual writer, and organizer of folk festivals for the Harrisburg area. Mrs. Hauck received her musical education from both private instructors and from Miss Thomas' School of Public School Music in Detroit, MI. She went on to teach music in public schools at Mechanicsburg and Hershey, PA, specializing in class piano methods.

Over the years, Mrs. Hauck gave demonstrations and acted as a musical consultant in 28 States for the Theodore Presser Music Publishing Co. in Philadelphia. Also during her distinguished music career, she wrote a class piano manual and conducted piano studies in the Lancaster and Harrisburg areas. She was appointed State supervisor of music, director of folk festivals, education and recreation program, work projects administration.

Accomplishing all of these activities would seem to be enough to satisfy most of us in a lifetime, but for Mrs. Hauck the list continues. Her extensive work with folk festivals is equally noteworthy. She conducted folk festivals throughout Pennsylvania since 1936 and was the originator of the Dauphin County Folk Council, conducting annual folk festivals from 1936 through the early 1960's. Her work also included compiling written material on the origin of American holidays, American folk tunes, and Pennsylvania folklore.

I would like the record to reflect my own personal pride in the accomplishments of Mary Barnum Bush Hauck, our constituent and lifelong friend from Harrisburg, PA.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS IN DEFENSE OF ANIMALS

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the 120th anniversary of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is being celebrated this month. I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the fine work that this organization has done by including in the RECORD an article by ASPCA president, John Kullberg.

The article follows:

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS IN DEFENSE OF ANIMALS

In the mid 1800s an American diplomat on assignment in Russia witnessed a cruel beating of a horse. The poor creature had fallen while trying to pull a heavily loaded cart up a steep, cobblestone grade. Rather than show compassion, the driver became enraged and repeatedly and forcefully whipped the helpless animal. The witness to this not-too-unusual occurrence was Henry Bergh, then America's legate to the Czar's court at St. Petersburg. Overwhelmed at how insensitive basically decent people can be to captive animal suffering, Bergh was determined to awaken in society a humane ethic that would encompass all creatures. Abruptly resigning his ambassadorial assignment, he returned to his home in New York City and, on April 10, 1866, founded the first humane society in America, aptly named The American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals [ASPCA].

The ASPCA is most commonly identified as a principal caretaker of New York City dogs and cats. And for good reason: Through its New York City animal shelters, adoption centers, pet registration efforts, lost and found offices, hospitals, spay/neuter clinics and pet behavioral consultation programs, the ASPCA directly cares for more dogs and cats each year than any other humane Society in the country.

But the ASPCA was founded as a national animal protection organization, and its earliest efforts were more typically directed toward remedying the mistreatment of nineteenth century horses. In contrast to today, the Society's first annual report made no reference to companion animals at all. Rather, the ASPCA of 1866 was involved with nationwide legislative efforts, sheep and calves, poultry, sea turtles, horse and cattle grain adulteration, horse-drawn carriages, animal transport, animal fighting and animals used for laboratory research.

Henry Bergh spoke glowingly of the rights of animals long before that term became fashionable in the last decade. Among other noteworthy attributes, a study of Henry Bergh's early writings shows him to be an antivivisectionist, a vegetarian and a pre-cursor of Schweitzer in his reverence for all life. By any measure Bergh is the patron saint of those committed to aggressive leadership in defense of animals.

Since the ASPCA was in its earliest days so strongly identified with horses, and is today so much identified with dogs and cats, a look at recent ASPCA efforts with regard to these three great species is helpful in demonstrating how much further we still have to go before ethical values benefiting all species become socially prevalent.

Wild horses: The ASPCA's historic efforts in defense of horses is today principally waged on two fronts: Action to stop federal legislation threatening America's dwindling wild horse herds and continued vigilance to assure that carriage and riding horses are not mistreated.

In 1971 Congress passed the Wild and Free Roaming Horse and Burro Act, legislation which protects wild horses on public lands. But western cattle interests, whose animals also graze on public lands, do not want to share their grazing areas and have lobbied to have the law revoked, amended and even declared unconstitutional. More than 310 million acres of federal lands are now being used by cattle ranchers. In support of this special interest group, Sen. James A. McClure (Idaho) has repeatedly introduced Congressional amendments to the Act which would, in effect, allow government to get into the horse meat business by selling at public auction large segments of wild horse herds to canneries.

To date, McClure has been unsuccessful. Undaunted, however, he asked for, and received, $17 million last year to finance the round-up of almost one-third of the nation's wild horses on the pretext that there is sufficient public interest in adopting them. In reality, however, these massive removals are intended to cripple federal Adopt-A-Horse programs by removing horses from the range faster than adoptive homes can be found. His all-too-obvious long-term plan? Sell at public auction the unadopted wild horses to canneries since no other alternatives acceptable to the cattle ranchers will exist. According to a spokesperson from McClure's office, this exorbitant funding and massive gathering of horses is designed to wear down opponents to this sale-to-slaughter legislation.

The ASPCA, particularly through its legislative office in Washington, D.C., is now actively working with Sen. Thomas Eagleton (Missouri), Congressman Bill Green (New York), and other concerned congressional leaders and humane groups to protect the Wild and Free Roaming Horse and Burro Act from increasingly aggressive efforts to weaken its humane provisions.

Captive horses: Many horses inhabit the less hospitable asphalt jungles of New York and other major American cities. The ASPCA has been trying through legislative initiatives and its own law enforcement powers to protect carriage and other city rental horses from drivers and owners who overwork or mistreat their charges.

Carriage horse drivers are the worst offenders. Many carriage drivers, as they relentlessly pursue tourist dollars, will employ every evasive tactic they can to avoid the ASPCA, and in New York they have an entire city at their disposal in which to be evasive. New York City law, which the ASPCA originally drafted and for which it effectively lobbied, requires that carriage and rental horse owners provide quarters which are clean, dry, heated and ventilated, and food that is sufficient and appropriate.

Horses must not be out in severe weather and cannot work for more than 10 hours in a 24-hour period; the driving pace is restricted and equipment in carriages regulated. The enforcement of this city law, however, is with very few exceptions left entirely to the ASPCA. Last year the ASPCA's 9 humane law enforcement officers assigned to New York City cited 210 carriage horse violations among more than 1,300 New York City animal-related summonses/appearance tickets they issued overall. But nine officers cannot cover all of the city during periods of peak stress to these animals, and most infractions inevitably go unchecked.

Many of those who are concerned about the welfare of the carriage horse would like to see an end to the "carriage trade" altogether. Others, including New York City Councilman Bob Dryfoos, have called for restricting carriages to New York City's Central Park so that they are not so extensively exposed to city traffic and exhaust fumes and their drivers are more available for monitoring. If now pending legislative reforms fail, the ASPCA will do everything it can to end an industry that increasingly proves itself to be ethically untenable.

Dogs and cats: The American Veterinary Medical Association (AVMA) recently updated a 1972 American Animal Hospital Association dog/cat population study and the results should be receiving more attention from concerned citizens and, particularly, city planners.

From 1972-1983, the number of cats in American households increased by 104 percent (from 25.5 million to 52.1 million). Dogs increased by 54 percent (from 36.1 million to 55.6 million). Combined, these figures represent a 75-percent increase over 11 years in the dog/cat population in America (61.6 million in 1972; 107.7 million in 1983).

But studies also show that at the very time more and more Americans are sharing their lives with dogs and cats, two-thirds of all pets are eventually abandoned. Most Americans are, it would appear, far from comprehending what responsible pet stewardship means. Last year, of the 130,000 animals brought to ASPCA shelters and hospitals in New York City, some 80,000 were unwanted.

Among major American cities, New York is alone in referring all of its unwanted pet problems to a private humane society. New York City has never fully addressed its responsibility to remedy pet overpopulation problems. As a consequence the ASPCA, the private humane society that functions as the city's pet problem referral agency, annually loses more than $1 million caring for unwanted New York City pets.

The ASPCA appeals for funds nationally to meet this loss. The ASPCA would prefer to spend more of these nationally raised monies on legislative and educational efforts aimed at eradicating the cause of animal overpopulation—public policies that encourage the breeding and merchandising of animals—rather than on the overwhelming and unabated consequences of pet mismanagement.

Pet overpopulation problems are far from being a New York City phenomenon. Nationally, more than 10 million unwanted pets are being killed by city pounds and, paradoxically, humane societies every year. An additional 10 million pets annually abandoned to the streets experience the agonies of disease, starvation, or worse, until they die. Unless public attitudes change this immense annual carnage will probably increase.

A funding remedy: City and state remedies to existing pet genocide practices are readily available. The traditional funding source for city animal control programs is dog license fees. But were New York City to rely on this discriminatory source for funding animal shelter and spay/neuter clinic programs, the yearly dog license fee would exceed $50.

A tax on pet foods and supplies would provide a much more equitable source of funding for animal shelters and spay/neuter clinics. The $5 billion-a-year American pet food industry, for obvious self-serving reasons, encourages pet breeding and pet marketing. A state-operated pet food and pet supply tax program modeled on existing cigarette, liquor and gasoline tax legislation would help state and city governments to more fully and effectively respond to the daily tragedies created by the pet overpopulation problems that the pet food industry's extraordinarily successful marketing efforts in large part create.

Success in overcoming the pet overpopulation tragedy in New York City or any other major American city through a fair and dependable funding base for animal shelters, spay/neuter clinics and education programs focusing on pet overpopulation issues would establish a national model for overcoming what is now a national disgrace. Legislative efforts to bring about such a model are currently underway in California, Texas and Illinois, as well as in New York.

In the 120 Years that have passed since the ASPCA's founding much good has come through its efforts and the efforts of the thousands of similar societies it has spawned. But clearly the battle against cruelty, neglect and irresponsibility is far from over. One need only review what is happening to America's horses, dogs and cats as well as to many other victimized species worldwide to dispel any doubts to the contrary.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. JUDD GREGG

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to enter into the RECORD an essay from a young lady who represents the finest in scholarship from the State of New Hampshire. Blessed with vision, ambition, and a sense of citizenship, Miss Jill Sible is the New Hampshire winner of the VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program. It is my pleasure to share with my colleagues this award-winning work from a young person bursting with aspiration, and who seems destined to fulfill many of them.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Jill Sible)

Caught up in the rush of my senior year, I often wonder what lies ahead in my future. With the proximity of entering college comes the realization that I will also be entering a whole new world of adulthood. What will I do with my life? Who will I become? What new horizons are there for America's youth? The members of my parents' generation have made incredible breakthroughs in every field, yet a generation is a relatively short period of time, and much of their work remains unfinished. This leaves my generation to build upon the foundations they have set and to make further progress socially, politically, medically, and technologically in an effort to better this nation and the world. Our opportunity to do this is limited only by our own degree of concern and willingness to try.

Many social barriers have been broken which bring America's youth even closer to that horizon called social equality. Women, blacks, and other minority groups are now given a chance in professional fields and given a voice in the political world. However, America still harbors some prejudice from which the new generation must breach. Much of the difficult work has already been done by activists such as Martin Luther King Jr., and Gloria Steinem, and today's youth can concentrate its energy more on bettering life for all people once they are accepted as equal.

For the first time in decades, there is tangible hope for world peace if America's next leaders are willing to continue the work their predecessors have begun. The meeting of President Reagan and Prime Minister Gorbachev has created a new line of Communication, a line which should be used with increasing frequency. This new horizon of world peace is perhaps the sunniest new horizon there is.

Even if space is attained, however, America and the world will always have a common enemy: disease. Recent advancements in the medical field may lead to the discovery of cures for many killing illnesses. Although many die yearly of diseases such as cancer and AIDS, scientists are learning more daily about these killers, and America's new generation of doctors will be able to use this information to develop treatments and even find cures for these deadly illnesses.

The last new horizon for America's youth and perhaps the most exciting is the opportunity available to even further develop American technology. With computers which can do almost anything and a space program on the brink of creating a passenger shuttle, the advancements that can be made by the next generation seem unlimited. There is such a strong foundation of technological knowledge that the researchers and developers of the future can conceivably create new machines which supply the world with an inexhaustible and inexpensive supply of energy. They may develop a method to mine valuable resources from other planets. They may even advance agricultural technology and end world hunger.

In technology as well as medicine, politics, and society, there are endless new horizons for America's youth, yet these horizons lead to roads both rocky and steep. They are challenges to me and my entire generation to work a little harder and strive a little farther than our predecessors did in order to preserve and implement our American ideals.

NORTH CAROLINA WINNER OF VOICE OF DEMOCRACY CONTEST

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its ladies auxiliary conduct the voice of democracy scriptwriting contest. This year more than 250,000 secondary school students participated in the contest, and I am most honored that one of my constituents, Kelly Margaret Jones of Greenville, NC, was the contestant winner from North Carolina. Kelly is a senior from J.H. Rose High School in Greenville, and I respectfully request permission to have her script, the subject of which was, "New Horizons for America's Youth," reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH
(By Kelly Jones)

The world today is vastly different from the world of our forefathers. The paths of pioneers have widened into broad highways. We live in a world of high technology—a world in which computers operate bakeries; diagnose diseases; control air and auto traffic; help design, produce, and market new products; read and write—even play cupid.

We, America's youth, are presented with boundless opportunities to broaden our horizons, to seek whatever tomorrow we choose. To pursue these opportunities, however, entails a sense of responsibility to something beyond ourselves. We must grow to the full measure of our capacity and utilize individual achievement for the common good. When we realize the responsibility which comes with our opportunities, we shall strive to learn all we can, to become all we can, and to do all we can.

The first horizon open to us is the pursuit of knowledge. Learning everything in an age of knowledge exploration is impossible, but learning all that we can is not only a challenge but a necessity. Even in our technically competent world, there is a serious flaw in education that is too practical, for it implies a final note to the business of learning. Education is never done, only begun. He who knows all for today will be ignorant tomorrow. As youth, we want to cultivate a sincere desire to learn, to become not just highly trained, but truly educated in the knowledge that lends color to the personality and vitality to the mind. To borrow the words of David Truman, what good is it to give the chemical structure of a delightful odor, if one cannot appreciate the beauty of the rose that produced it?

If we succeed in our pursuit of learning, opportunities are endless for what we may become. As the world becomes more complex and the people who inhabit it become more creative, there evolve an increasing range and variety of vocations from which we can make our livelihood. We are the products of mobile people and, therefore, are constantly exposed to new culture which can broaden our concept of life to reflect, not only our material wealth, but a standard of life measured in terms of our basic beliefs in man and his role in this world of atoms—a standard that reflects the heritage of America and shows the world what it is that makes us what we are. We have the freedom to grow like the tree; every tree must have a trunk, but it can put out branches in profusion, and the branches will spread and intertwine with one another to produce the whole specimen.

The final horizon open to us, America's youth, is the privilege to act on our convictions. Individual conduct multiplies itself a million fold in chain reactions among other individuals. We have the opportunity to show our faith in the merits of the individual and our allegiance to the principles of democracy; we have the opportunity to put our beliefs into practice. If we want our ideas to conquer, we must dedicate ourselves to them as faithfully as did the first small band of men who came to establish a foothold on this continent.

America has given to us, its youth, a rich birthright—a birthright founded on freedom. If we accept the challenges which this freedom brings, we shall explore the new horizons open to us and make visible our faith in the democratic tradition. We will learn all we can, be all we can, and, ultimately, do all we can. Our correlative obligation will be to convert the freedom we have been given into power which will work for human betterment and enhance freedom, dignity and integrity among people and nations.

SHOULD WE LEARN FROM HISTORY OR MERELY REPEAT IT?

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, history is the chronicle of mankind's collective experience. Our past is the fountainhead from whence our future springs. We move from what was to what will be. It is a cyclical ritual, a perpetual motion distinguished by infinite variations on a central theme. The theme is human behavior; the variations are successive improvements. Or so it goes in theory: We are supposed to learn from our mistakes. Tragically, we are all too often inclined to repeat them.

We are witnessing a replay of history as we consider once again the issue of providing aid to the Contra forces in Nicaragua. We have traversed this route before, only to find ourselves mired in the mud of intransigence. We are infrequently offered the opportunity to undo our mistakes; fate has now bestowed upon us a second chance.

As irony would have it, this was the month—11 years ago—in which we confronted the impending Communist occupation of Southeast Asia by ignominiously abandoning our allies, our tails between our legs and our heads in the sand. Assuredly, the situation then was not identical to the current one in Central America: We have not been fighting an unpopular war for 10 years, we have not lost 50,000 of our sons, we have not spent $140 billion on a losing proposition.

What is comparable, however, is the alacrity with which we relinquish our responsibilities to friends and our adherence to principles. Faced with imminent disaster in South Vietnam and the de facto loss of Cambodia, President Ford, on April 10, 1975, appealed for $722 million in emergency military aid and an additional $250 million in humanitarian and economic assistance. At the very least, we needed to buy time in order to allow the South Vietnamese to evacuate from hopeless positions. Congress, in its finite wisdom, chose to let the body hang and twist slowly in the wind, a macabre and grisly finale to a long and frustrating period of U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia.

That choice is again before us. Shall we once more choose expediency and evidence, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn observed, "the Western world has lost its civil courage?" There are many who chose to cut and run in 1975 who were subsequently made uneasy by the genocide which followed. Chagrined, perhaps, but not contrite.

The President has requested $100 million in military assistance for the Contra forces who are waging a life-and-death struggle for their homeland. There are several valid reasons why I believe it is vitally important to provide this aid.

First, the present Nicaraguan Government is a force for evil in the Western Hemisphere and the world. Documents captured on Grenada incontrovertibly reveal the extent to which Soviet and Cuban plans to infiltrate and exploit the Sandinista regime have succeeded. The intention is clear: Promote, train, and export terrorism, revolution, and communism throughout Latin America. The myth that the Sandinistas are nothing more than a ragtag bunch of agrarian reformers can be dispelled forthwith; they take their marching orders from Moscow and Havana, and they intend to provide the Warsaw Pact with a vital outpost in the U.S. backyard.

Second, Nicaragua threatens to destabilize the succeeding but fragile democracies in Central America. Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador, and Guatemala have all shed their despots and adopted democratically elected governments. The dictators of years past have been consigned to the history books. And even Panama has, in the past few years, been inclined to more moderate ways since the reforms of 1983. But Nicaragua threatens to undermine these advances. Efforts to form stable governments, promote economic and social progress, and allow the benefits of democracy to be enjoyed by the people are all confronted by Nicaraguan meddling, terrorist activity, and guerrilla attacks. Once Central America is destabilized, Mexico will be next. At what point do we take a stand? It is important to note that not once has a Communist government—whether elected or imposed—voluntarily given up control of a nation. When popular discontent led to overt attempts to reform or change Communist rule in Hungary (1956) and Czechoslovakia (1968), the patriot uprisings were brutally suppressed. Totalitarian government plus Soviet expansion: This was the reason for the invasion of Grenada. The citizens there had no choice. Neither will the people of Central America.

Third, negotiations have not succeeded. It is erroneously charged that the President is seeking a military solution instead of a diplomatic one. This argument is a not-so-benign ruse, part of the disinformation campaign designed to malign and subvert American policy. In fact, we have pursued diplomatic negotiations, attempting since 1981 to achieve a peaceful political solution. Since 1983, three special envoys—Philip Habib being the most recent—have made 48 trips to the region. High-level bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaraguan officials have taken place nine times since June 1984 alone. On the other hand, Nicaragua terminated its participation in the Contadora talks in the fall of 1985, and in December, voted against an Organization of American States resolution calling for accelerated negotiations. The Ortega government has rejected repeated overtures to negotiate a settlement following the 1984 cutoff of U.S. military aid. It has, instead, imported $350 million worth of Soviet arms, of dubious value in improving the lot of Nicaraguan peasants. Last May, Congress voted against providing military aid to the Contras, part of the reasoning being that we needed to show "good faith" and provide an incentive for Ortega to sit down at the negotiating table. What he did was fly to Moscow and proclaim his solidarity with international communism. We held out our hand; he spit in our face.

Fourth, Nicaragua has become a training ground and haven for terrorists of all nations. The PLO maintains a presence there as do other extremist groups spreading hatred and violence throughout the world, such as the Red Brigade of Italy and the Baader-Meinhof radicals in West Germany. We, as all decent people everywhere, have been shocked by the escalation of terrorism and hostage-taking, piracy on the high seas, and the hijacking of airplanes, murder, and destruction. From the massacre of the Israeli Olympic team in Munich in 1972 to the Achille Lauro episode, outrage has been piled upon outrage. And there is no end in sight. And these fanatics are attending school in Nicaragua with the blessing—indeed, cooperation and encouragement—of the Sandinista government.

Fifth, it is alleged that the Contras are merely former adherents of the despised Somoza regime and that we are indirectly funding a reimposition of an antidemocratic dictatorship. Contrary to this canard, only 2 percent of the 20,000 Contra rebels were in the old National Guard. A far higher percentage of Contra leaders are actually former Sandinistas who helped overthrow Somoza, and who have broken with Ortega once they realized the true nature of his rule. Anti-Somoza leaders Arturo Cruz, Alfonso Robelo, and Adolfo Calero initially helped the Sandinista revolution; they now lead the Contras. Fully 40 percent of all Contra forces are former Sandinistas. Their crime? They believe in Nicaragua, not in the Soviet Union.

Sixth, opponents of aid are quick to point out that we have no allies on this isue, especially among Latin American nations. This is a false assertion. Most Latin heads of government publicly oppose U.S. aid for the Contras; privately, they plead for it as the only way to maintain pressure on the Nicaraguan government. Direct U.S. intervention will not succeed because it will only serve to inflame anti-American sentiment in the entire region. But the Ortega regime must be stopped before it undermines all of its neighbors. (Incidentally, Interior Minister Tomas Borge has publicly proclaimed that the goal of the Sandinistas is to foment revolution and death up to and into U.S. territory). Even the socialist President of Spain, where voters wary of Soviet intentions recently supported Spanish participation in NATO, privately informed American officials that everything must be done to stop the cancer of Nicaragua from spreading to other Latin American nations. A Gallup poll published over March 2–3 this year indicated that Nicaragua was perceived as a military threat by 92 percent in Costa Rica, 89 percent in Honduras, 63 percent in El Salvador, and 48 percent in Guatemala. Moreover, Nicaragua was viewed as a Soviet agent by 93 percent in Honduras, 92 percent in Costa Rica, 80 percent in Guatemala, and 74 percent in El Salvador. Nine democratic Latin American prime ministers have informed President Reagan that they fully support his initiative to provide military aid to the Contra forces.

Seventh, we are faced with a potential refugee problem of catastrophic proportions if we allow the Sandinistas to export revolution and terrorism. The loss of democratic governments through destabilization of its Central American neighbors is bad enough. But we face an onslaught of refugees—10 to 20 million of them—should the Sandinistas succeed. In fact, the Government of Mexico has already secretly requested information from the administration as to how many landing ships, personnel carriers, and other seaborne and airborne craft our military could provide to assist them in ferrying those refugees to our borders. We can not and must not allow this to happen. Disaster will strike if we do nothing.

Eighth, an assertion heard all too often is that the Contras are just as bad as the Sandinistas. Reports of atrocities, murders, rape and pillaging, roving bands of cutthroats, and terrorist campaigns permeate the debate. Recently obtained information proves otherwise. Many religious and humanitarian groups operating in Nicaragua have been led to believe in these Contra atrocities; they have been victimized by a highly successful disinformation campaign. Alvaro Jose Baldizon Aviles was a former chief investigator of the special investigation committee of the Nicaraguan Ministry of Interior, where he worked under the infamous Tomas Borge. He was essentially the chief of internal security. Baldizon was also an avowed Marxist-Leninist who joined the Sandinistas out of idealism and received part of his education in the Soviet Union. But in the 6 years he served the Sandinistas, he learned that theory and reality are not the same. In July of last year, he fled to Honduras and has provided an insider's view of what has been going on in the Nicaraguan Government. Among his revelations is that there have been at least three platoons—one in 1981, two in late 1982—of troops trained in East Germany for special duty in Nicaragua. They returned well-versed in the use of NATO weapons and dressed as Contra rebels. Their mission: Commit acts of terrorism and atrocities for which the Contras would be blamed.

Fifteen, twenty years ago, many opponents of the war in Vietnam were asked, "Where would you draw the line against Communist aggression, if not in Southeast Asia?" Although there were some genuinely opposed to war of any sort in any place, the response was largely "we have no business getting involved overseas; we should be concerned only with our own hemisphere, on our own doorstep." Well, Central America is in our hemisphere, and the knocking is getting awfully close to our own door.

These are the reasons I am backing the President and support giving aid to the Contras. If not here, where do we draw the line?

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I am today calling on all Americans to join in an effort to remember the events of our recent past, as a reminder that we must never allow these atrocities to be repeated.

The annual official observance of the "Days of Remembrance," commemorating the victims of the Holocaust, is a necessary reminder to every American that we must continually rededicate ourselves to the principle of equal justice for all people.

In the spring of 1945, our American GI's and the Armed Forces of other free nations discovered the full horror of a decade-long campaign of death and destruction on the European Continent. Now, 41 years later, we are still unable to grasp the total horror of the series of events that we call the Holocaust.

The events of the Holocaust are well documented. The death camps had their own photographers and filmmakers, who recorded hours of horrible activities in graphic detail. Allied forces took their own photos and reporters were on hand to report the findings of our forces during the liberation of the death camps.

Survivors have told about their personal suffering and the suffering of others who did not survive. I have spoken with survivors of the death camps, now living in my district. After hearing their words, I have a real, personal understanding of their strong commitment to remembrance as the only preventive medicine available to mankind. They feel committed to telling their stories so that mankind will not forget that even civilized, industrialized nations can allow inhumanities to occur on a massive scale.

No other series of events in the 20th century has been examined and reexamined more than these events, because no other series of events in this century is as barbaric on such a massive scale.

As incredible as these well-documented events were to us 41 years ago—as incredible as they remain to us today—the truly unbelievable part of this long story of suffering is the public declaration by a small group of people who claim that these events never occurred.

In spite of all the evidence. In spite of the personal accounts and the documentation. In spite of the fact that some of these camps have been preserved as reminders, we are asked by this small group to believe that these events were somehow manufactured.

And, that is why we need "Days of Remembrance," to tell this story to a new generation, born after World War II, and to pass along the warning that such acts of horror can occur in any nation that singles out one group of its citizens and blames that group exclusively for all of that nation's troubles.

The message of history is clear. It has happened before and it can happen again, if we forget, or worse yet deny, the past.

A SALUTE TO CONCERNED BLACK MEN

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, there has been much said in the last several weeks regarding the deterioration of the black family in America. Further, there has been a conspicuous absence of the images and work product of positive black men. Today, I rise to respond to this evidentiary void and to salute the Washington, DC, chapter of Concerned Black Men [CBM] Inc., a group of men here in the Nation's Capital, who are moving in their own quiet way to help make a difference for black youth. Adopting as its motto "Caring for Our Youth," the Washington, DC, chapter of CBM began functioning in February 1983, after having studied the successful efforts of the Philadelphia chapter of CBM—now in its 11th year. CBM's goal is to organize concerned black men who are willing to devote time and energy, regardless of professional status and schedule demands, toward the development of positive self esteem and meaningful adult-youth communications. They do this by sponsoring various programs, and at the same time, creatively exposing youth to positive black male role models.

Led by attorney Donald Temple, its first president, and a core group of 15 black men, the Washington chapter's first major program was the Martin Luther King, Jr., Oratory Contest for area junior and senior high school students. With approximately 65 students participating and 15 judges from the political, business, and educational communities, the program was an overwhelming success.

Under the committed leadership of Temple and Attorney Clarence Daniels, its second president, CBM continued to expand its membership and programs.

To date CBM has:

First. Sponsored its first annual Black Youth Recognition Dinner for area youth at the National Press Club and will be hosting its second annual dinner on May 2, 1986;

Second. Sponsored three Annual Martin Luther King, Jr. Oratory Contests;

Third. Sponsored three award banquets for contest participants and three trips to the Philadelphia CBM award banquet;

Fourth. Conducted three all-day workshops on "Job Interviewing and Preparation Techniques" and participated in several high school career programs;

Fifth. Conducted 30 teenage pregnancy or sexual awareness workshops for junior high and elementary school students;

Sixth. Adopted Staton Elementary School in southeast Washington for targeted attention and effort;

Seventh. Conducted its second annual Black History Bee;

Eighth. Sponsored an oratory contest for the Lorton Prison Youth Center on "The Responsibility of Black Men";

Ninth. Implemented a career black shadow program which allows youth to interact with CBM members and other individuals on their jobs;

Tenth. Sponsored several luncheons for the student body leadership of various District of Columbia high schools; and Eleventh. Sponsored two citywide programs for black male youths "On Becoming a Man."

While many of CBM's original members and officers are attorneys, its membership base now includes physicians, economists, educators, journalists, policemen, photographers, business executives, and others.

Mr. Speaker, CBM's record of action speaks highly of their concern for black youth. It is no wonder that President Reagan awarded their national organization the 1985 Presidential Volunteer Service Award.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to salute the Washington, DC, chapter of Concerned Black Men, its current president, Mr. Anthony Williams and all of those Concerned Black Men who send that needed and special message to black youth, not through words, but deeds: "We care and we love you."

To epitomize their contribution to black youth, I bring the following letter to your attention:

WASHINGTON, DC,
May 23, 1984.

DEAR CONCERNED BLACK MEN: I praise your name and the works of your hands, and I pay homage to the depth and expanse of spirit from which your work is brought forth.

I thank you, further, for the process orientation of the Martin Luther King, Jr. oratory contest. All of my students learned a great deal from Dr. Boyd and from seeing how the skills I teach every day lead to self actualization.

Your compassionate aid to my student (William Bryant Frazier), who lost his speech before his oratory presentation, was most remarkable. The roles you model are indeed, worthy of emulation! Your warmth, professional manner, brotherhood, and relaxed dignity bear witness to the spirit that moves among you before it suffuses the youth whom you touch. The fruit of your labor must be growing each day! May it and you and all of us continue to thrive.

Sincerely,

CONSTANCE THOMAS RAZZA.

MEETING OUR DEADLINES

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, April 15, was an important deadline for taxpaying Americans, one which most of them made every effort to meet. Yesterday was also an important deadline for Congress—but ours went unmet and virtually unremarked.

Since we passed the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation, much time has been spent decrying how setting an orderly schedule of deficit reduction would bring untold devastation to our society. Well, society need not worry—we have yet to meet a single target date.

Yesterday, Congress was to have completed action on a fiscal 1987 budget resolution. Instead, we have barely begun, and are instead once again considering a new spending bill.

If taxpayers miss their April 15 deadline, they know they will suffer the consequences. Unfortunately, when Congress misses its deadline, it is again the taxpayers who suffer the consequences.

Instead of a budget, today we are talking about spending about $7 billion more than would have been spent otherwise, and taking away the President's 65-year-old authority to defer spending he finds excessive. To accomplish this, we had to first pass a special rule allowing us to waive standing House rules prohibiting us from legislating in spending bills and exceeding subcommittee ceilings.

Members of the Appropriations Committee have worked hard on this bill, which contains funding for many programs that, considered separately, are reasonable and important. The bottom line, however, is $7 billion we would not be spending otherwise, putting us $7 billion further from reaching the fiscal 1987 deficit target.

At some point, we are going to have to begin making some choice on spending priorities, and start meeting targets and deadlines. I am sorry that this is not that time.

PLEASURE ENDEAVORS

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention and the attention of our colleagues a very special organization in my congressional district, San Francisco, which, for nearly a decade, has actually acted on the principle that our senior citizens have a vast reserve of creative energy and talent which can be cultivated to improve both their personal lives and environments.

In 1987, Pleasure Endeavors Projects, Inc., will celebrate a decade of service to frail elders and other residents of long-term care facilities. It is the only organization of its kind that provides indepth, action art programs with very real avenues by which those under care may find ways to break the bonds of institutionalization. It is about real goals, personal relationships, and individual dignity.

This project began as a grassroots endeavor—to decorate the largest geriatric hospital in the United States through the efforts of the elderly and disabled residents who live there. Currently, a magnificent elder art gallery is being completed on the third floor of the huge facility and there are plans for exhibits to include many elders there and throughout the community.

The Artist-Development Project—the nucleus activity which backed this endeavor—continues to offer support for artistic exploration and skills development for residents of Laguna Honda and several other convalescent homes in San Francisco.

A team of well trained artists, recreation professionals, reentry seniors, and community volunteers join together to provide person-to-person support for aspiring artists. Those who come to the Artist-Development activities find that teaching is primarily a function of acknowledgement, confirmation, and close personal interest. In this regard, the term "art therapy" is redundant.

Exhibits are held regularly; paintings do not end up in drawers. It is not about making a bunch of bowls and ashtrays and selling them in the annual bazaar for a nickel or a dime. Artworks are sold for a fair price and the artists get all the money—less direct expenses. The artists get acknowledgement and confirmation through their presence at the art show, announcements and personal public contact that, again, confirms and raises self-esteem through public appreciation of their efforts.

Other projects include reproductions of artworks; calendars, cards, and other artifacts. Recently, a universal communication board was developed for those who have hearing or speech loss. It is a pointer board of unique design which features the artwork of a participant of Artist-Development activities, and it is receiving a tremendous response nationwide from the professional and private sector while helping those who could not otherwise be able to communicate.

Pleasure Endeavors Projects is a charitable, nonprofit organization supported by the San Francisco Commission on the Aging, the Senior Community Service Project [E.O.C.], Laguna Honda Hospital, The California Arts Council, Pacific Bell, Levi Strauss, Project 20, the Telephone Pioneers, the San Francisco Volunteer Center, the National Center on Arts and Aging of the National Council on Aging and Coming of Age, Inc.

I urge all my colleagues to contact my office to review the materials and the art work produced by the seniors involved in Pleasure Endeavors. I think you will be genuinely surprised and may want to encourage the development of a similar project in your congressional district.

THE FOURTH PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the fourth of 10 pillars of sound money and credit is the principle of monetary policy. These are troubled times insofar as monetary policy is concerned, as witnessed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Baker, and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Volcker. Mr. Baker publicly advocates further depreciation of the dollar in terms of foreign exchange, while Mr. Volcker is on record as saying that such a path is strewn with dangers, and may trigger a run on the dollar. We are like the passengers of an aircraft watching the pilot and the copilot fight over the flight course in mid air.

It would be far safer for the Nation and the world if the Congress discharged its constitutional duties in fixing a monetary standard. This would then set the course for both the pilot, Mr. Baker, and the copilot, Mr. Volcker, and a crash could be avoided.

This series has been commissioned by the American Economic Foundation, 1215 Terminal Tower, Cleveland, OH 44113. Earlier parts of this series were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, see volume 132, No. 36, March 21, 1986, page E 946.

THE FOURTH PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY AND CREDIT: THE PRINCIPLE OF MONETARY POLICY

(By Antal E. Fekete)

A CHINESE TALE

Once upon a time the Treasury of the Celestial Empire was found empty. The Emperor instructed Hwa, the Chairman of the Heavenly Research Council, to work out a plan to meet the emergency.

Hwa suggested that the Emperor assume the title "The Son of Heaven", thereby laying claim to supernatural powers. The Emperor would then inject words and phrases such as "targeting the money supply", "clean versus dirty floating", "the crawling peg", "semi-fixed standard", "snake in the tunnel", "softening the bands of hard currencies", and so forth, into the public debate on money, thereby endowing these meaningless words with sacramental effects. The purpose of the exercise would be to induce men to give up actual goods and services in exchange for fictitious ones.

The Emperor went along with these proposals and debased the silver coins of the Empire, while retaining the coins' outward appearance. But the people refused to be duped, and they accepted the debased coins only at a discount. Hwa threw himself at the feet of the Emperor. "Son of Heaven, it is not enough for you to claim absolute power over the value of coins and over the destiny of the people. You must also forbid any examination of your claims. You must outlaw logic. All questions about currency depreciation must be tabooed. To ask them, to answer them, even to think of them must be declared an act of sacrilege, and unpardonable sin. Only then will people believe that coin-clipping is no self-mutilation but, rather, the mutilation of their competitors. Only then will the coolie stop cursing, and start blessing, his yoke.

The Emperor was not impressed. "Hwa, you talk like a fool. Even a child can see through your theocratic fraud. All he need ask is whether the priest is the instrument of religion, or religion is the instrument of the priest. The proof that the people have been duped is that the priest is rich and powerful. He can taboo questions, he can adjust moral principles to suit himself. So your studied gestures and poses, your hieroglyphic messages are losing their effects because people observe your simony, the trafficking in relics. Seek as one may, there is no substitute for an informed and enlightened public opinion. It is the only remedy."

Then the Emperor recalled the debased coinage, and let it be known that hard times can be overcome if everybody worked, and saved, even harder. Before twelve moons have passed, the Treasury was once more replete with full-bodied silver coins.

THE BIGGEST HUMAN EXPLOITATION

Today people take it for granted that "targeting the money supply" is a legitimate objective of monetary policy. It wasn't always like that. In 1932, the Canadian economist and humorist, Stephen Leacock, could joke:

"The gold standard has fallen into opprobrium. A while ago it looked as safe as the rock of ages, and now it is being relegated to the age of rocks. We have been learning some new economic truths. Consider the control of the money supply. What does it mean? A lot of flowery words have grown up around this. But if that means anything at all, it means that there will be a board, a committee of people who will, when they like, expand money or contract money, and boost prices up or boost prices down. There will be three men in a room somewhere who will do that. If that time ever comes, I want to be one of the three, or at least a warm personal friend of all three."

"Now I say this in all sincerity that the three-men-in-a-room stuff will do for the Soviets; it will not do for us. You cannot have a system of social controls dependent upon the will of three men in a room. You cannot have prices which can be moved up by a group in control. You cannot have wages which can be shifted down in their purchasing power by the good will of the men of the monetary caste. You must weigh that very, very carefully. The board, when it boosts prices up or down would follow, or be tempted to follow, all sorts of self-seeking ends. You cannot run society like that. If you try to have a money standard based on human interest or opinion, you have started the biggest human exploitation one can possibly imagine."

THE GREATEST VIRTUE OF THE GOLD STANDARD

The concept of the money supply is a spurious one, and the idea of targeting the money supply by open market operations of the Fed is a modern theocratic fraud, establishing the biggest scheme of human exploitation in history. The extent to which this method of plunder is practiced is in inverse proportion to the perspicacity of the people. It is in the nature of abuses to go as far as they can. Plunderers conform to the Malthusian law: they multiply in direct proportion with the means of existence—and the means of existence for knaves is the credulity of their dupes.

If God had made man a solitary animal, everyone would labor for himself, and individual wealth would be in proportion to the services that each man performed for himself. But since man is a social creature, services are exchanged for services. Moreover, to provide for certain needs such as security, the members of society organize governments and agree to tax themselves in order to cover these needs. The government too is subject to the Malthusian law. It tends to expand in proportion to its means of existence which, in the last analysis, is nothing but the substance of the people. So when the government runs out of real services, it will continue to expand by offering fictitious services to the taxpayer. Targeting the money supply is one of the most reprehensible of these fictitious services.

In private transactions each party remains the sole judge of both values: the value of services rendered, and that of services received. The individual is perfectly free either to decline the exchange or to make it elsewhere. The greatest virtue of the gold standard is that the medium through which these services are exchanged is left outside of the political arena, and hence individual valuations remain as free of distortion as possible.

But when the government starts targeting the money supply, it interposes between the exchanging parties a medium which cannot be valued because it has, by design, not definable value. In combination with that fatal disposition, that one man could always be persuaded to live at the expense of others, this interposition by the government creates enormous disparities between the exchanging parties, while plundering both. The people are astonished to find that, while they hear of wonderful inventions that are supposed to save labor and multiply output without end, they are working as hard as ever and are still no better off than before. Meanwhile, things go from bad to worse and, at last, people open their eyes, not to the remedy (for they have not yet progressed that far), but to the evil.

MONETARY POLICY UNDER LIMITED GOVERNMENT

Targeting the money supply is an arbitrary and unlimited power, which is at variance with our Constitution and with the principles on which our government is based. Constitutionally, the government has a carefully circumscribed responsibility in the realm of money. This is to see to it that the value of every kind of money in circulation, namely, coins, bank notes, bank drafts, bank deposits, etc., rigidly conforms to the standard unit of value. The government is charged with the responsibility of stabilizing and value of currency, and it must not aggrandize its powers by destabilizing it.

THE VIETNAM WAR AS VIEWED BY A TEENAGER TODAY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I thought my colleagues might be interested in the work of Megan Furth, a 13-year-old from San Francisco, CA, who recently wrote on the Vietnam war. Being a congressional staff member at the time of the war, I was very involved in the debate and still have my own strong beliefs about the war. But it is interesting to see how our young people today, who did not grow up during the war, view it after researching it and talking to veterans who were there. I am encouraged that so many of our young people are interested and willing to learn from our past and I am pleased to share one such analysis with my colleagues:

STATEMENT BY MEGAN FURTH

This report is trying to give all those who were not alive during, or did not understand, the Vietnam War an understanding of it. Before I started this report, I did not even know where Vietnam was, but even greater I did not know that it was, as Newsweek termed it, the "longest, saddest, baddest war America ever fought." ("The Legacy of Vietnam," Newsweek, April 15, 1985, p. 32.)

HISTORY: PRE-1946

It could be said that the Vietnam War began with the invasion of the French in 1858. During the 1800's the French took over such cities as Hanoi, Saigon, and Da Nang. They imposed colonial rule throughout Indochina in 1884. The Vietnamese were treated like slaves, and the resources of their country were exploited. The Vietnamese people were unhappy in this oppressed state.

Ho Chi Minh was perhaps the most important person in the history of Vietnam. He was born in 1890 in Vietnam and grew up hating the French because they controlled his homeland. His life-long goal was to make Vietnam a free and independent country. Although Ho Chi Minh was a devoted communist, he was less concerned with political system than that Vietnam be free. He was a man of action rather than ideas. It has been said that he was first and foremost a Vietnamese nationalist.

In 1919 Ho petitioned the members of the Peace Conference at Versailles for the emancipation of the Vietnamese people. In 1927 he founded the Vietnam Nationalist Party. In 1930, because of instructions from Moscow, he developed the first Vietnamese communist party called "Dang Cong San Dong Duong" (Indochinese Communist Party). In 1940 he started to train revolutionary troops. In 1941 the Viet Minh Party, dedicated to the independence of Vietnam was founded.

1945 was one of the most important years in the Vietnam War. On March 9 the Japanese dissolved the French government in Indochina and declared Vietnam "independent." In April of that year, President Roosevelt died, and President Truman was sworn in. In July of 1945 President Truman approved the military decision to divide Vietnam at the 16th parallel. In August of that year Japan surrendered in World War II. In October of 1945 the British and the French signed an agreement that the French could again rule South Vietnam.

THE INDOCHINA WAR

Ho Chi Minh and the French signed an agreement in September of 1946 giving the French unlimited power in Vietnam. In October of that year the Viet Minh attacked the Saigon Airport and made a last stand before retreating to guerrilla warfare. At the end of 1946 French ships shelled Haiphong, killing 6,000 civilians. In December of 1946 the French demanded the disarmament of the Vietnamese army, and the Vietnamese refused. Large-scale conflict broke out.

This first year of the Indochina War was a period of power struggles and shifting alliances. The Viet Minh insisted upon full recognition of their party and full independence for Vietnam. The French chose a policy of military victory and did not negotiate with Ho Chi Minh. The French advanced that the Vietnamese emperor could lead the nation; this was the "Bao Dai solution." In June of 1948 the French signed an agreement granting the independence of Vietnam, but no authority was actually transferred to the Vietnamese. In June, Ho denounced the new government as a puppet of France. Also in June of 1948 the Emperor, Bao Dai, arrived in Saigon and took power as head of state. There now were two Vietnamese states: that of Ho Chi Minh and that of Bao Dai in 1950, the United States recognized the Republic of Vietnam (Dao Dai); in that same year, the U.S.S.R. and China recognized the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (D.R.V.N., run by Ho Chi Minh).

In February of 1950 the Bao Dai government asked the United States for economic aid in prosecuting the Indochina War. In May of that year President Truman approved a 10-million-dollar grant for assistance in the Indochina War, to be administered through the French. Also in 1950, the Korean War broke out. At the end of 1950 Truman ordered increased military aid to the French in Indochina and send a Military Assistance Advisory Group (M.A.A.G.) to Indochina. The United States was now committed to the Bao Dai government.

In November of 1951, then Senator John Kennedy visited Vietnam and stated that there was little support for the pro-French, Bao Dai government among the people of Indochina; however, our commitment had already been made. By 1952 the United States had already borne one-third of the war's cost.

In October of 1952, his political support declining, Bao Dai withdrew from politics. President Eisenhower was sworn in shortly thereafter and stressed the need to block communist aggression "to save the rest of Asia." This was the "domino theory," which stated that if Vietnam fell to communism, it would trigger a whole row of dominoes which would also fall to communism. Indochina, Thailand, and the Malay Peninsula would fall, then Indonesia, and eventually we would be fighting off communists in Hawaii.

In December of 1953 Ho Chi Minh had offered for the last time to negotiate a truce with the French. He was turned down. At that point the French dug in at Dien Bien Phu, and the Viet Minh began their famous seige—which ended in the military defeat of the French in April of 1954. In the meanwhile, in January of 1954, at the Berlin Conference, the United States, France, the United Kingdom, and the U.S.S.R. agreed to convene in Geneva to seek a resolution to the Indochina War. In May 1954, after the French were defeated, the Geneva Accords were signed, dividing Vietnam at the 11th parallel. By October of that year the last French troops had left Vietnam. They had lost a war that they had been fighting for almost a hundred years. Very soon after, President Eisenhower offered South Vietnam direct economic aid.

THE HEART OF THE VIETNAM WAR AND UNITED STATES INVOLVEMENT

If we backtrack ten years, we learn some interesting things. In 1945 Ho Chi Minh asked for America's support in freeing Vietnam. He was turned down. President Roosevelt had intended to suggest that (1) Vietnam become an independent country and that (2) the United Nations supervise the development of this country. He intended to do this after World War II. Unfortunately President Roosevelt died in April of 1945, and President Truman did not carry out his intentions. If Roosevelt's plan had been carried out, history might have been very different. The United States got involved because of the domino theory (explained on page 4), which was based on a fear of communism. In truth, Ho Chi Minh and his cadres, although they were communists, just wanted their country to be free and independent. If is significant, for example, that the first lines of the declaration of Vietnamese independence, which was written by Ho Chi Minh, are the same as ours: "We hold these truths to be self-evidence: that all men are created equal . . . ."

As it was, President Eisenhower pledged economic aid to South Vietnam shortly after he was sworn into office. In 1955 the United States took over the training of the South Vietnam Armed Forces. In 1955, the elections promised by the Geneva Accords failed to materialize; and in 1957 the International Control Commission reported that neither North nor South Vietnam had lived up to their obligations under the Geneva Accords. Problems were bound to develop.

At the end of 1957 the United States' installations in Saigon were bombed by communists, and in 1958 guerrilla warfare tactics began in South Vietnam. By 1950 the number of American advisors in Vietnam increased to 685. Ho Chi Minh's government, in North Vietnam, and the U.S.S.R. protested against the increased American involvement. Also in 1960, the National Front for the Liberation of South Vietnam, known as the NFL or Viet Cong, was organized.

1961 was a turning point in the war; this was when the Americans increased their support dramatically. In this year President Kennedy pledged more help to South Vietnam. There were now 3,200 military aids in Vietnam.

At this point the United States set up the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam. Robert Kennedy announced that United States troops would remain until the Viet Cong had been defeated. On a radio show in Peking, China, it was stated that the United States was waging an "undeclared war" in South Vietnam. At this point, United States forces had increased to 11,300 men.

In 1963, Diem, the leader of South Vietnam who had been supported by the United States government, was murdered along with his brother, Ngu. Nguyen Ngoc Tho took over South Vietnam. President Kennedy was also assassinated that year, and the new President, Lyndon Johnson, promised more support of Vietnam.

During the terms of Johnson we dramatically increased our military assistance of South Vietnam. In 1964 our troops level reached 21,000. There were also several direct attacks on the United States by the Viet Cong; they sunk an American aircraft transport, and they bombed American installations in Saigon. In 1965 President Johnson ordered around-the-clock retaliatory bombing strikes on North Vietnam. The number of U.S. troops reached 27,000. In mid-April the U.S.S.R. and North Vietnam proposed a four-point program for negotiations, which included the withdrawal of foreign troops and the reunification of both Vietnams through free elections. The United States responded by increasing its troop strength to 46,500. The U.S. also continued to bomb North Vietnam. Then, by October and November of that year, the U.S. troop strength was increased to 148,300.

In 1966 Ho Chi Minh declared that the Hanoi peace plan must be accepted by the United States if war was to end. A week later, President Johnson announced the resumption of bombing after a 37-day pause over the Christmas holidays. In March of 1966 215,000 American troops were in Vietnam, and in April of that year we initiated B-52 bombing raids over North Vietnam. At that point U.S. forces were said to be at 245,000, plus 50,000 naval people offshore. In December 1966 there were raids by the United States around Hanoi.

In early 1967, General Westmoreland, who headed our forces in South Vietnam, requested additional United States troops there. His request was granted, and President Johnson, in his State of the Union Message, defended our involvement there, stating that he would persevere in the war despite "more cost, more loss, and more agony." So as you can see, Johnson was taking this "undeclared" war very seriously. He was again demonstrating the intensity of this war. He then ordered a new type of military action, to hasten the end of the war; he authorized the bombing of North Vietnamese industrial targets, which had previously been restricted. In June of 1967, U.S. military strength was at 463,000. In October of 1967, Generals Thieu and Ky were inaugurated as president and vice-president of South Vietnam.

In 1968, the North Vietnamese offered to meet with the United States in peace talks; the offer was accepted. Also in 1968, Richard Nixon was elected, promising peace in Vietnam. In 1969 the Viet Cong launched a general offensive in South Vietnam. At this time, U.S. forces had reached 541,000 men, which was the peak of our involvement.

Shortly thereafter, in 1969, Nixon met with President Thieu and announced the withdrawal of 25,000 American troops from Vietnam. This was the first withdrawal from the war. In the second half of this year Nixon also announced the "Nixon Doctrine," which states that the United States will avoid situations like Vietnam in the future by limiting its assistance to economic and military aid rather than active combat involvement. Also in 1969, a "defeat" in some ways for the communists was the death of Ho Chi Minh, on September 3 of that year. Near the end of the year, Nixon withdrew another 35,000 men, and the American troop level was at 479,500.

In the first part of 1970, Prince Sihanouk was overthrown as head of Cambodia. In April, Nixon withdrew another 50,000 men, and the number of American soldiers was down to 429,000. In October Nixon proposed a cease-fire plan. In July of 1971 the North Vietnamese presented a peace proposal to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in a secret meeting in Paris, calling for a withdrawal of U.S. forces within six months, release of prisoners of war, and free elections. The United States forces were then at 160,000.

In 1972 Nixon was relected. Peace talks broke down, and Nixon ordered the renewal of the bombing—which had been called off in late 1968, after peace talks were agreed upon. On January 8, 1973, however, the peace talks were reconvened, and all offensives operations in North Vietnam were ordered stopped. Accords were signed in late January, 1973, and a cease fire began on January 28. Five hundred American prisoners of war were then released by the North Vietnamese.

In 1974 the cease-fire of January 1973 broke down, but the conflict did not overtly involve any American troops. Then in 1975 Hanoi launched an all-out offensive to take Saigon. They captured several cities which were the key to taking Saigon. General Thieu resigned as president in April 1975, and the South Vietnam Assembly elected General Van Minh as president with instructions to find a way to peace. On April 30, 1975, President Minh surrendered unconditionally to the Viet Cong, who entered and occupied Saigon. The United States military evacuated the remaining one thousand Americans began the evacuation of 130,000 Vietnamese. It was the end, for the Americans, of a very depressing war.

When the United States retreated from Vietnam, we did it quickly. The whole collapse of South Vietnam had taken only 55 days. Some of our officers left on helicopters from the roofs of building.

In 1976 Vietnam formally declared its reunification as the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, with its capital at Hanoi.

WHY THE NORTH VIETNAMESE WON

There are many reasons why the North Vietnamese won the war; however, several are worth mentioning. First, back in 1968, the North Vietnamese had gained an important psychological victory with the "Tet Offensive." Beginning on January 21, 1968, they launched an 11-week seige to take over Saigon by attacking other American bases. The first was Khe Sanh. This base held up against the seige, but diverted our attention from the cities in the south which were the prime targets for the Tet Offensive. The date chosen for the attack, for maximum surprise, was the sacred holiday of Tet, of the lunar New Year, which, in 1968, fell on January 29. For the offensive, all available Vietnamese communists were used. Children would throw grenades at soldiers. Everyone was out to kill. On that night, the North Vietnamese attacked in eight different locations, and one thousand troops entered Saigon. By February 1, the communists controlled 30 provincial capitals, 60 district capitals, and many bases. Although most of these were recaptured and the North lost 32,000 men in this fight, they had a new perspective on the war.

Another characteristic of the war which made it difficult for the Americans was that it was "frustrating." The enemy was everywhere. Children and old women were soldiers, as much as men in uniform; and there was no way of telling one Vietnamese from another, which was a communist and which was not. Also it was not a war fought with conventional tactics. It was a war of guerrilla tactics.

Another problem for the U.S. was the lack of public support at home. There were massive peace demonstrations. The soldiers were fighting a war that people at home did not support. The American public did not suffer during the Vietnam War; there were no war taxes and no rationing, as in World War II. This was true even though we were deeply involved. We dropped more ammunition in the Vietnam War than in World War II and the Korean War combined.

AFTERMATH

The general feeling about the Vietnam War was that we should not have gone. Vietnam veterans say that they may have gone to the wrong war, but they went for the right reasons—that is, the blood and guts of this war were no less horrifying for the men who were there. A lieutenant in Vietnam once saw one of his men's legs blown off. The lieutenant said, "I will never forget the boy's face and or his words: 'Lieutenant, will you please tell 'em that I gave it all I got ?' "

It is said today that Americans are still feeling the "Vietnam syndrome," which is to rule out all use of military force in every foreign conflict, even one where the chances of success are good.

The Vietnam War was the first war that the United States ever lost, but the loss itself was not as traumatic for the Americans as the way we left there. We went to Vietnam to stop communism. But Vietnam could have been a democratic country. Ho Chi Minh asked for American support in 1945. He was turned down. Americans have had to face the fact that they have been wrong. For once the clean-cut guys from Virginia had destroyed unnecessarily.

The war also had many political effects. Lyndon Johnson did not run for a second term because of the war. Reagan's views in some ways have come from the effects of Vietnam. Nixon was elected President because he promised peace in Vietnam.

But the biggest effect has been on the Vietnamese themselves. The North Vietnamese have imposed a grim, repressive regime throughout the country. It is one of the poorest nations in the world, but invests its best minds in its military. The Vietnamese are quiet people as it is; but, with the communists there, they have become silenced even more and are always on the defensive. Vietnam has returned to being an oppressed nation.

PELHAM PARKWAY CITIZENS COUNCIL CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, this week the Pelham Parkway Citizens Council celebrates an important milestone—its 25th anniversary as the umbrella organization for 16 organizations representing the diverse neighborhoods that comprise the Pelham Parkway area of the Bronx.

Since it was formed a quarter century ago, the Pelham Parkway Citizens Council and the fine fraternal, civic, religious, political, educational, and professional organizations it represents have been a major catalyst in stabilizing the Pelham Parkway area and making it a great place to live.

As the Congressman who represents Pelham Parkway, I am proud of the determination, perseverance, and community spirit of those citizens who serve on the council and work to provide the 80,000 residents of Pelham Parkway with improved physical, cultural, educational, and recreational facilities and activities.

Many talented and creative people serve or have served on the Pelham Parkway Citizens Council. One of those citizens is Mr. Henry Yuspeh, who has been a catalyst for community improvement through his position as president of the council. Through patience and hard work, Mr. Yuspeh and his colleagues on the council have overcome bureaucratic redtape time after time to rack up a long string of success stories that have contributed greatly to the quality of life in the Pelham Parkway community.

Soon after it was formed, the council joined forces with Public School No. 105 to push for a new centrally located library for the area. That building now stands as a symbol of what organized community action can accomplish.

The council currently is fighting to force major changes in the conditions at the Bronx Psychiatric Center. So far, the council has succeeded in seeing a new director appointed and improvements in the center's facilities.

In other areas, the council: serves as a liaison between the community and the police force; is a driving force behind cultural offerings in the area; and has been responsible for numerous neighborhood cleanup and graffiti removal campaigns. On a far-reaching level, the council is the catalyst behind a letter writing campaign to insure that our Nation's prisoners of war and those missing in action are accounted for and not forgotten.

The Pelham Parkway Citizens Council is a wonderful example of civic responsibility that should serve as a model for other grassroots community organizations throughout our Nation.

I congratulate the Pelham Parkway Citizens Council for their 25 years of outstanding service to their community and I know I speak for all Bronx residents when I offer my support and admiration for the indispensable services they have provided over the years.

INTRODUCTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL DEBT, TRADE, AND FINANCIAL STABILIZATION ACT

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced on behalf of the majority of the members of the International Development Institutions Subcommittee, which I chair, legislation to address the serious problem of developing country debt. This legislation has evolved after detailed oversight and legislative hearings on the ideas contained in the bill. Our proposal is aimed at strengthening and expanding the Baker initiative on debt launched last October in Seoul, South Korea. We have taken timely action on this matter so that it can become part of the Speaker's trade bill scheduled to go to the House floor the week of May 12.

The effect of the debt crisis on the U.S. trade deficit is clear. Since the onset of the debt crisis in 1982, in order to earn badly needed foreign exchange to pay their international debt, debt ridden developing countries have closed their economies to imports and concentrated on boosting their exports. Over one-third of the 1985 U.S. trade deficit was with developing countries. The United States has experienced a 32 percent decline in exports and a 13 percent increase in imports since 1981 with the key 15 debtor countries recently identified in the Baker debt initiative. The trade deficit with these same countries has grown from $3.3 billion in 1981 to $21.3 billion in 1985. The Overseas Development Council has estimated that 1.4 million U.S. jobs have been lost due to the trade ramifications of the debt crisis.

The United States also has other reasons to seek a solution to the debt crisis. Our banks are dangerously overexposed to developing countries who will continue to have serious difficulties paying their debts unless they can secure some breathing room from their debt burdens. Effectively addressing the debt crisis is critically important to preserving United States foreign policy and security interests around the world, particularly in Latin America where infant democracies are struggling to maintain the support of their people.

The bill proposes steps to increase the effectiveness of the World Bank and other multilateral development institutions. It is our belief that the World Bank must play the key catalytic role in bringing about a satisfactory resolution to the debt crisis. The World Bank must help increase the flow of capital into developing countries. To help achieve this we urge the World Bank to propose that a temporary adjustment be made in its disbursement practices to forward World Bank capital to developing countries in an accelerated, but still responsibly monitored, fashion. In addition, we call for steps to help developing countries boost domestic savings rates and minimize the capital flight from their countries. Finally, the bill proposes ways which the World Bank can increase its capital base without involving direct appropriation by the Congress during this difficult budgetary environment.

The World Bank must also help bring about important economic policy reforms in developing countries. To help achieve this, we call for an increase in structural adjustment lending by the World Bank. The bill makes particular reference to the need to have as a goal the gradual liberalization of trade and investment policies of developing countries. An essential ingredient in providing expanded resources to developing countries to deal with their debt burdens must be future access to their markets. This not only will strengthen the world trading system, but also contributed to making the economies of the developing countries more efficient and competitive.

To help improve the investment climate in developing countries, the bill endorses the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency [MIGA] recently negotiated and endorsed by the administration. This new multilateral agency will provide political risk insurance to private investors in the developing countries. Because of the serious budgetary situation facing us presently, the bill defers authorization of any new funds for this purpose until next fiscal year.

As a means of promoting U.S. interests, the bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to take steps to keep U.S. firms fully informed of bidding opportunities in countries receiving loans from the multilateral development organizations. In many instances, the United States is losing valuable export business associated with multilateral development bank loans to our trading partners simply because we are not aggressive enough.

The proposed legislation also calls upon our industrialized trading partners to assume a larger share of the burden of developing country imports. Last year, the United States imported 62 percent of the manufacturing exports of developing countries. In contrast, the Europeans only imported 23 percent and Japan 8 percent, respectively. Both the Japanese and Europeans can do much more to help solve this debt crisis through adjustments in their trade and investment policies.

The final section of this proposed legislation attempts to improve the stability of the international financial system. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury, in conjunction with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and Comptroller of the Currency, to explore changes in the structure of U.S. capital markets and regulation of private financial institutions to help address the debt crisis. Any lasting solution to the problem of developing country debt must involve the participation and cooperation of private banks both in dealing with existing debt and insuring that adequate new resources flow to these countries.

The Baker initiative was an important policy reversal by the administration. It correctly identified the widespread economic consequences of Third World debt. The legislation we propose today is an effort to sustain this initiative for our long term economic interests, both for the well-being of developing nations and the United States.

THIS WAS GWEN

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 26, 1986, Mrs. Gwen B. Giles, the assessor for the city of St. Louis and a very dear friend of mine, departed this life. She left behind a legacy that will be difficult for anyone to follow or to forget. Her death must be viewed as a dark and deep tragedy.

She was that very special kind of person who touched our lives in a very special way and one whose memory will last forever.

I would like to share the following information with my colleagues on Mrs. Gwen B. Giles, which appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch on April 1, 1986.

GWEN GILES EULOGIZED AS A BRIDGE-BUILDER

Gwen B. Giles was eulogized Monday as a community bridge-builder who "was as comfortable in the streets as she was in government suites."

Mrs. Giles, 53, who died Wednesday of cancer, was St. Louis assessor after having served as the first black woman in the Missouri Senate. Several speakers at her funeral recalled also her earlier work as a civil rights fighter and community leader in the West End.

The burial in St. Peter's Cemetery followed the two-hour funeral Mass and ecumenical service at St. Rose Catholic Church, 1001 Goodfellow Boulevard. About 400 people attended the funeral.

The Rev. C. Garnett Henning Sr., pastor of St. Paul African Methodist Episcopal Church, who gave the eulogy, said: "I come not to mourn the passing of Gwen, but to celebrate her life. She achieves in death what she had sought in life—bringing us here together today—black and white, Catholic, Protestant and Jew."

Michael E. Newmark, a representative of Jewish groups, recalled that he had first worked with Mrs. Giles in a program sponsored by the National Council of Christians and Jews. He said they had worked together again in recent years when she became concerned about relations between blacks and Jews.

"She dreamed of building solid bridges between our religious and ethnic groups that would indeed make a better community," Newmark said.

The funeral Mass was concelebrated by the Rev. James Moll, pastor of St. Rose, and Monsignor John Shocklee, executive director of the Archdiocesan Office of Human Rights.

Moll stepped down from the altar to the closed casket, where he said: "We all know a bit more peace, a bit more strength, a bit more life because of Gwen Giles."

Several public officials who attended also spoke in a series of farewell remarks.

Lt. Gov. Harriett Woods recalled that she had preceded Mrs. Giles in the state Senate, "and when Gwen came, I never stood alone again." Mrs. Giles represented the 4th District on the North Side from 1977 to 1981.

Mayor Vincent C. Schoemehl Jr., who then appointed her as city assessor, said she had brought energy and enthusiasm to every job she undertook.. "Her vision and hope touched as all," he said.

Rep. William L. Clay, D-St. Louis, alluded to her role as manager of his first congressional election campaign. "Many of us here today would not be who we are if not for the contributions of this very special lady," Clay said.

Margaret Bush Wilson, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. said: "She had the serenity to accept what she could not change, the courage to change what she could and the wisdom to know the difference."

WORLD FOOD DAY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing House Joint Resolution 595 which would designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day." World Food Day celebrates the founding of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations in 1945. For the past 5 years Congress has supported this commemorative day which has been an effective tool in increasing the public's awareness of the global problems of hunger and malnutrition.

As public concern about world hunger grows, the importance of special days like World Food Day increases. Hundreds of colleges, universities, and other local organizations participated in various activities to help educate their communities on the problem of hunger last year. These individual activities add up to the huge worldwide movement that will give the hungry the support they need to succeed. Public concern has already created enormous resources for Africa and is stimulating the political commitment needed to achieve long-term success.

By designating October 16, "World Hunger Day," Congress will join these communities and initiatives in a committed national effort to alleviate hunger in the world.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in the RECORD, I am inserting the full text of the House Joint Resolution 595 to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day."

H.J. RES. 595

Whereas hunger and chronic malnutrition remain daily facts of life for hundreds of millions of people throughout the world and famine is again affecting so many of the countries of Africa;

Whereas the children of the world suffer the most serious effects of hunger and malnutrition, with millions of children dying each year from hunger-related illness and disease, and many others suffering permanent physical or mental impairment, including blindness, because of vitamin and protein deficiencies;

Whereas Congress is particularly concerned by the rise of hunger, recurring natural catastrophes, and inadequate food production and distribution now affecting a large number of African countries and the need for an appropriate United States response to emergency and long-term food needs of that continent;

Whereas there is growing recognition that improved agricultural policies, including farmer incentives, are necessary in many developing countries to increase food production and national economic growth;

Whereas there is a need to increase the involvement of the private voluntary and business sectors, working with governments and the international community, in the search for solutions to food and hunger problems;

Whereas although progress has been made in reducing the incidence of hunger and malnutrition in the United States, certain groups, notably Native Americans, migrant workers, the elderly, and children, remain vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas national policies concerning food, farmland, and nutrition require continuing evaluation and should consider and strive for the well-being and protection of all residents of the United States and particularly those most at health risk;

Whereas there is widespread concern that the use and conservation of land and water resources required for food production throughout the United States ensure care for the national patrimony we bequeath to future generations;

Whereas the United States has always supported the principle that the health of a nation depends on a strong agriculture based on private enterprise and the primacy of the independent family farm;

Whereas the United States, as the world's largest producer and trader of food, has a key role to play in efforts to assist countries and people to improve their ability to feed themselves;

Whereas the United States has a long tradition of demonstrating its humanitarian concern for helping the hungry and malnourished;

Whereas efforts to resolve the world hunger problem are critical to the maintenance of world peace and therefore to the security of the United States;

Whereas Congress is acutely aware of the paradox of immense farm surpluses and rising farm foreclosures in the United States despite the desperate need for food by hundreds of millions of people around the world;

Whereas a key recommendation contained in the 1980 report of the Presidential Commission on World Hunger is that efforts be undertaken to increase public awareness of the world hunger problem;

Whereas the member nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations designated October 16 of each year as World Food Day because of the need to alert the public to the increasingly dangerous world food situation;

Whereas the Food and Agriculture Organization was conceived at a conference in Hot Springs, Virginia, with a goal of freedom from hunger and 1985 marks the 40th anniversary of the organization's existence;

Whereas past observances of World Food Day have been supported by proclamations of the 50 States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States, by resolutions of Congress, by Presidential proclamations, by programs of the United States Department of Agriculture and other Government departments and agencies, and by the governments and peoples of many other nations; and

Whereas more than 330 private and voluntary organizations and many thousands of community leaders are participating in the planning of World Food Day observances for 1986: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1986, is hereby designated as "World Food Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate activities to explore ways in which our Nation can further contribute to the elimination of hunger in the world.

THE CASE AGAINST FURTHER AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, a distinguished New York attorney, Mr. Robert L. Boehm, has cogently stated the case against any further aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. I commend the attached letter to the attention of all Members of the House.

APRIL 7, 1986.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: President Reagan, fighting desperately to get $100,000,000 for "his" Contras, paints dire pictures of despair if Congress does not support his demand. Yet he says nothing about what will happen if he does get his $100,000,000.

This is an area into which neither he nor his supporters have ventured. Why not? Because he cannot explore this possibility without exposing the weakness of his position.

Does he or anyone else suppose that $100,000,000 to the Contras will end the war in Nicaragua? The Contras have failed to hold a single town or for that matter a blade of grass for even a few days. They can do no more than run for refuge in Honduras when the going gets rough. Headed by a mixed bag of former Somocistas and young soldiers of fortune, they have very little popular support in Nicaragua. They have not even been able to agree on their own political aims.

What must happen after the $100,000,000 is spent? Will the President then agree that their mission is a failure and that we must withdraw our support? A most unlikely scenario. Instead the Reagan program will call for more aid—this time $200,000,000 to $300,000,000—with greater emphasis on more offensive weapons, like armed helcopters, high-powered gunships, etc., and more "advisers" and "trainers."

On the third try the President will ask for American troops, or at least the Marines . . . a replay of the Vietnam fiasco.

This is the real question behind the facade of "only $100,000,000." Must Congress grant this request? Arm twisting and political deals have become the order of the day. But Congress can have its own program . . . not more arms but a political settlement for Nicaragua with the United States and with its own Latin American neighbors.

The assumption that Congress must give in and allow the President some of what he wants is without foundation. If the separation of powers means anything at all, it must mean that legislative powers must be independently exercised—not subject to domination by the Executive. Compromise is all very well, but it cannot work when in effect compromise means surrender.

The Administration has already seen the failure of its military approach. The only realistic alternative is political and diplomatic . . . the reconvening of the Contadora nations and the United States in a genuine effort to resolve the issues. Such an approach is totally incompatible with more dollars for the military. Only if the military approach is rejected will it be possible to place a diplomatic effort on the agenda. Our present military approach—the funding of the Contras—not only is leading us toward all out war, but in fact violates basic rules of international law embodied in the Charters of the UN and the OAS, as well as fundamental principles of U.S. constitutional law. Let us think clearly before we rush into the misguided Reagan "policy."

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT BOEHM.

MASS STARVATION: A SOVIET POLICY

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, on a recent trip to Arizona, I picked up a copy of the Arizona Republic which contained a truly excellent editorial on the use of starvation by the Soviet Union as a tool for achieving population subservience. It comes as no surprise to most of us that the Soviet Union and its puppets violate individual human rights—but it should concern and shock all of us that mass starvation is practiced in this day and age as a means of overpowering and controlling those who defend themselves against Communist rule. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this editorial be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and commend it to the attention of each of my colleagues.

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC,
April 12, 1986.

SOVIETS: STARVATION AS A POLICY TOOL

Communists regularly use famine—planned, deliberate, premeditated, state-sponsored mass starvation—as a means of executing foreign and domestic policy.

This is little known in the West for the simple reason that it is usually carried out under ideal totalitarian conditions with the borders of affected areas sealed off to outside journalists and diplomats.

Millions have been starved to death deliberately in the Ukraine, China, Cambodia, Ethiopia and Afghanistan while the world went on la-di-da in blessed ignorance.

There is, however, a sinister side to this lack of awareness: Western self-censorship.

By 1932, Josef Stalin had run out of patience trying to collectivize and bring a stubborn Ukraine under Soviet control. He sealed the borders of the region, stripped it of foodstuffs down to killing the cats and dogs, and in a year had murdered at least 7 million, and perhaps as many as 15 million, Ukrainians.

The tragedy was hidden from the West by Stalin's ironclad censorship and by a conniving Western press sympathetic to socialism.

New York Times correspondent Walter Duranty, a Pulitzer Prize winner and dean of Western reporters in Moscow, toured the afflicted area and denied in print the existence of the famine, an act for which Stalin awarded him the Order of Lenin. It is now universally recognized that Duranty lied.

Malcolm Muggeridge, an idealistic young communist reporter for the British Guardian, in 1933 secretly got into the Ukraine and reported the famine only to have all his stories "spiked." Muggeridge left Russia disillusioned and repulsed by "one of the most monstrous crimes in human history."

All this would be of purely historical interest except for the fact that the "spiking" of the Ukrainian famine story continues in 1986.

The Ukrainian Studies Fund of Harvard University, completing a massive three-year study of Stalin's planned famine to be published in October, has been unable to interest any major news organization in its work.

And don't look for the award-winning documentary film Harvest of Despair on television. The commercial networks, the Public Broadcasting System and most local stations have refused to air the film documenting Stalin's deliberate mass murder despite its having been awarded a gold medal over 837 entries from 44 countries at the 1985 International Film & TV Festival.

Why this resistance to airing the film? Because it isn't chic to criticize the Soviet Union in an era of summit meetings and cultural exchanges; it isn't wise to risk Russian reprisals against your Moscow news bureau; because the film isn't "balanced" with the Soviet side.

The Soviet side? Do documentaries on Hitler's Holocaust give "the Nazi side," as if there is a "side" in favor of genocide? Anyway, the Soviet response is self-contradictory: (a) The famine never happened; (b) the famine happened but was an accident of nature.

The Kremlin threatens and blusters every time the subject is broached. When Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney mentioned it in a speech last year, the Kremlin charged he was trying to overthrow the Soviet government!

How does the West deal with a government that starved its own people by the millions to gain its ideological ends? The idea is so monstrous and so cuts through our more comforting images of the Soviet Union that most would rather assent to the Russian view of reality than challenge it.

And it continues. An article in the April Commentary magazine details how the Ethiopian Marxist government is using a Stalinesque famine to collectivize agriculture. In Afghanistan, the Soviets have destroyed the agricultural infrastructure to break the will of the freedom fighters. More people per capita face starvation in Afghanistan than in Africa.

While the West prattles on endlessly about the Nazi Holocaust and makes insincere protestations of "never again," communists systematically carry out genocide by famine, hidden safely behind the barbed wire of their gulag states and Western self-willed blindness.

FELTON GROVE FLOOD CONTROL PROJECT

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would authorize a flood control project in the Felton Grove area of Santa Cruz County, CA. The severe storms this year have once again caused extensive flood damage in the Felton Grove vicinity. This area has suffered significant flood damage year after year, causing a public safety hazard and a direct threat to homes immediately adjacent to the river bank and necessitating the evacuation of area residents. The sooner a permanent solution can be put in place, the less the danger to the lives and property of area residents.

Mr. Speaker, the text of the bill follows:

H.R. 4608

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to carry out a project for flood control in the Felton Grove area, Santa Cruz County, California. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this Act.

ILLINOIS SUPPORT FOR SET-ASIDE PROGRAM

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, while the Reagan administration attempts to bury the Small Business Administration in the Department of Commerce and the Civil Rights Commission and the Office of Management and Budget attempt to roll back the gains of the Federal Government's set-aside program, my home State of Illinois is attempting to get a bigger share of Federal contracts for the State's small businesses. The Government Assisted Industry Network [GAIN] is a bipartisan, statewide organization of business executives working to bolster existing efforts to help get a bigger share of Federal contracts for the State's small businesses.

Recently, this organization sent a letter to the 24 Members of the Illinois congressional delegation urging opposition to the proposed procurement rules changes which would virtually eliminate the set-aside program.

Mr. Speaker, the GAIN letter is but one more illustration of the broad-based support that this popular program enjoys. While the set-aside program still needs to be improved and expanded, it is a worthwhile and necessary example of how the Federal Government can assist small and minority businesses obtain their fair share in our Nation's economic system.

The GAIN letter follows:

GOVERNMENT ASSISTED INDUSTRY NETWORK,
Springfield, IL, March 15, 1985.

MEMORANDUM

Re Small Business Set-Aside Program.
To: Illinois Congressional Delegation.
From: House Speaker Michael J. Madigan and House Minority Leader Lee A. Daniel.

Members of the Government Assisted Industry Network (GAIN) are asking your help in preventing proposed procurement rules changes which would virtually eliminate the set-aside program for small businesses.

The changes proposed by the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) would require procurement officers in the Department of Defense, National Aeronautics and Space Administration and General Services Administration to "demonstrate that a sufficient number of responsible small business concerns will respond" to an invitation to bid "at the lowest reasonable cost."

The previous standard for set-aside contracts required only that "at least two responsible small businesses offering reasonable prices" demonstrate an interest in bidding.

Small business leaders, procurement officials and the Small Business Administration all agree that the new standard, if adopted, would sharply reduce, if not actually eliminate, small business set-aside contracts. Set-aside contracts account for nearly half of the procurement contracts won by small business on the national level. It would clearly harm Illinois, which already has far less than its share of all federal contracts. According to the most recent figures provided by the Small Business Administration, Illinois small businesses received 22% of the federal contracts awarded the state in comparison with an average of 14% won by small business in other states. Clearly a reduction in small business contracts would undermine our state's economy.

On behalf of the members of GAIN we urge your strong bi-partisan support for HR 4097 sponsored by Representative Esteban Torres (D-California) or similar legislation which would preserve the current rules for procurement officers establishing set-aside contracts.

With your timely assistance, we can prevent a step backward in the effort and develop a fair procurement system which offers a reasonable share of contracts for small businesses.

H.R. 4515

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the rule on H.R. 4515, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill, because it linked two nongermane items, the Contra issue, and repeal of the President's deferral policy, with the supplemental appropriation. Neither of those items should have been joined to the bill.

The distorted rule, which is contrary to the regular procedures of the House, was the reason for my positive vote on the Hamilton amendment. My original inclination was to vote against the Hamilton amendment, but when an affirmative vote offered the opportunity to sever the Contra issue from the appropriations bill, I took advantage of that opportunity.

Incidentally, I will still vote against the next rule on the supplemental, because it will still include legislative langauge repealing the deferral authority along with the appropriations. The vote for the Hamilton amendment only cured one-half of the problem.

What infuriated the Republican minority today was the fact that the Speaker, in providing a vote on the President's proposal, provided one under which success was impossible. The President was sworn to veto the supplemental. Even if his Contra proposal had been passed, he would have had to veto it along with the rest of the supplemental.

That procedure is an affront to our system. I voted against the President's proposal, but I strongly believe he, or any other President of any party, deserves an honest chance to present his policy to the Congress.

Unfortunately, the Democratic majority, uses the combination approach on an increasing number of important spending bills. Our continuing resolutions are a national disgrace, but they are used repeatedly to drag poor spending programs along with essential ones.

Today's confrontation is only the beginning. Long after today's issue is forgotten, legislators will still be trying to add nongermane amendments to bills of one kind or another.

When they are aided by congressional leadership, as was the case today, the whole process becomes more of an exercise in cronyism, and less representative, and less working of the people's confidence.

The House, and its Democratic leadership, suffered a real embarrassment today. No wonder H.R. 4515 was abruptly pulled from the schedule.

EL LAGARTILLO

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, before we vote to spend another dime to expand our war against the Nicaraguans, let us ponder what our policy has meant to the small farm cooperative known as El Lagartillo. For in essence, the Contra war is simply El Lagartillo writ large.

I commend the attached letter, which I recently received from a group of Americans studying in England, to the attention of all Members of the House:

OXFORD, ENGLAND, MARCH 1, 1986.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: Last March, you and your colleagues received a letter from ourselves and 43 other American students then living in Oxford (CR, 25 April 1985, E1768). In that letter we urged you to vote against funding for the Contras fighting to overthrow the government of Nicaragua. We are writing you now to tell you of an event in Oxford last May which we believe helps illustrate the absurdity of our current policy toward Nicaragua, and once again to urge you to vote against the renewal of any aid—including so-called "non-lethal" aid—to the Contras.

Last May, students in Oxford held a sponsored fast to raise money for El Lagartillo, a small farming cooperative in Nicaragua which had been attacked by the Contras. We raised £7000 (about $10,000), which is now being held by the Dominican priest in the village. According to an explicit agreement between ourselves and the priest, the villagers are using the money to do the following:

Roof and stock a school; construct a food storehouse and supply center; construct new homes for several families; install a system of potable water; purchase farming tools; purchase tools and other essentials for the village women; provide secondary-school scholarships for the area children; purchase preschool supplies; purchase 80 acres of land for ten landless families; and provide a discretionary fund for neighboring villages.

We know where our $10,000 has gone. Do you know where the $27 million Congress gave the Contras last year went? We can report it went to support people who did the following to El Lagartillo:

Burned the school and several homes (est. value: $1,600); burned a grainstore and farm tools (est. value: $2,700); burned a number of personal possessions (est. value: $2,900); and killed six villagers—three adult men, one 20-year-old woman, and two 14-year-old boys—as they were working in the fields.

[Source: The Catholic Institute for International Relations, 22 Coleman Fields, London N1 7AF, U.K.]

As Oxford residents, we are proud that we have been able to help one community cope with life in a war zone. As United States citizens, we are deeply disturbed that our government is funding that war and assisting those who perpetrate cruel attacks on innocent Nicaraguans. President Reagan, in the wake of the attacks at the Rome and Vienna airports in December, said he does not speak "with men who kill 11-year-old girls." But he favors giving $100 million to people who kill 14-year-old boys. Many of the estimated 8,000 civilians the Contras have killed have been children. These crimes are not anecdotal: they are pervasive and ongoing, and they have been documented ad nauseam by Americas Watch, Amnesty International, the Washington Office on Latin America, and many others.

That is why this year we are helping organize the International Fast for Peace in Nicaragua, which will consist of scores of local fasts like Oxford's in Europe, Britain, Canada and the United States. This is more than a symbolic act—fasters will raise money for a variety of relief efforts to ease the effects of the war on the people of Nicaragua. We will be working through Oxfam, the American Friends Service Committee, and other reputable groups to see that our money does go to truly humanitarian efforts in Nicaragua.

The fast in the United States will take place in a number of congressional districts in early March. The underlying premise is that our government's funding of the Contras is immoral and counterproductive.

Once more, we urge you in the strongest terms to vote against any further funding of the Contras in Nicaragua, and to pursue instead constructive policies which address the real problems and needs of Central Americans.

Respectfully yours,

SARAH SEWALL,

SPACE POLICY NEEDS FURTHER GUIDANCE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, one of the obvious results of the space shuttle Challenger tragedy has been a revival of national interest in America's space program. Not since the 1960's have so many of our citizens focused their attention on NASA's policies and programs. It is sad, but true, that many Americans have not looked closely at our space activities since the Apollo flights to the Moon.

Much has happened in the U.S. space program over the past 15 years. Despite the recent disaster, the shuttle program has represented an historic achievement. There have been many other major triumphs for NASA as well, including the Pioneer missions to Jupiter in the early 1970's, the Viking landings on Mars in 1976, and the Voyager visits to Saturn in 1981 and Uranus in January 1986. NASA's exploration of the solar system has resulted in revolutionary advances in our knowledge of our sister planets. NASA's scientific programs have expanded our understanding of the physical dynamics and characteristics of our planet, and of Earth's history and heritage in the universe.

But there have also been disturbing trends in the U.S. space program since the momentous Moon landings of the late 1960's. Specifically, the Defense Department has come to control an ever-increasing, and now domineering, portion of the Federal space budget. In the 1960's, NASA was receiving 60 to 70 percent of the Nation's space budget, with the Pentagon controlling most of the rest. This relationship has now been reversed, with the Pentagon now commanding 60 to 70 percent of total Federal space expenditures. Compared to this year's NASA request of $7.6 billion, the Pentagon's request of nearly $17 billion for space and space-related activities is a symbol of the increasing militarization of the Federal space budget.

The Pentagon's growing control over U.S. space policy might come as a surprise to many people, and it should, for it has not been the result of public debate over national space priorities. Rather, it has resulted from the lack of such debate, combined with the Pentagon's incredible ability to direct national spending patterns.

The Pentagon's growing control over our space program may not have come about if there had been an institutional mechanism for reviewing and directing overall national space policy, and for weighing civilian space priorities against those of the Defense Department. But we do not have such a mechanism. The comparative size of our civilian versus military space programs has been the result of a haphazard and incoherent process which has had little oversight.

In my opinion, we need a new organizational entity established for the explicit purpose of developing national space policy.

The Pentagon is now proceeding with a think tank of its own that, in my view, will generate an even greater appetite at the Defense Department for space dollars. I refer here to the Strategic Defense Initiative Institute that has been requested by the Director of the SDI and authorized by the Secretary of Defense. Although not yet created, this institution would lead to an even further domination of military space programs over those of NASA and other civilian agencies.

The Nation's rekindled interest in space programs should be given expression through the establishment of an institutional entity that directs overall national space policy. The Nation once had such a body—the National Aeronautics and Space Council. The NAS Council was originally formed under the 1958 NASA Act, but was abolished during the Nixon administration. Tomorrow during markup of the NASA authorization bill by the Science and Technology Committee's Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, I will propose that the United States develop a better method of developing its space policies. Reestablishment of the NAS Council would be an obvious and sound beginning. I will also, however, be looking into the possibility of creating a new National Space Policy Institute along the lines of the Defense Department's Rand Corp.

Given the uncertainties facing our national space program, combined with the resurgence of interest in it, I feel we simply cannot move forward into space without a coherent policy directed by a group of individuals specifically dedicated to such a mission. Such a group would help insure that America moves into the 21st century with a bold space program that reflects all our national interests.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to my colleagues an upbeat essay written by a high school student in my district for the Veterans of Foreign Wars' annual essay contest. Anne Marie Roberti is a senior at Classical High School in Providence and the winner of the Voice of Democracy contest for the State of Rhode Island. Her optimistic outlook gives me great hope for the future of our Nation.

The essay follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

America's youth—what could be a more interesting topic than this one. The future of society—the future of the world, even, depends on America's youth. "You will be the leaders of tomorrow" we have all been told ever since we have been able to walk. I believe this. I believe that we can do anything we want, and we will. I'm sure of it!

Today's teenagers are very much aware of society and keep abreast of current events. No longer can we be sterotyped as the giddy, mini-skirted school girls and the no-minded jocks of previous generations. We fight and protest for what we believe in but usually in a civilized, nonviolent way. Recently, at Brown University, female students picketed against the sexual harassment that they felt they were getting from certain male students. No riots occurred, no one got hurt, and the females' cause was heard and helped.

I believe that today's youths are ready to love and accept each other; thus, establishing a receptive and open-minded nation. We know that society's norms are being broadened and that we aren't as restricted as our parents were when they were growing up. This knowledge gives us an incentive to achieve our goals, and it gives us the feeling of power, that tells us we can do whatever we want. "Do your own thing" sound the voices of the eighties.

Because we aren't sheltered, we can experience the evil of society as well as the good of it. We aren't shielded from death, wars, hostage crises, bombings, or airplane crashes. They are all too common for them not to be a part of our lives. The growing threat of nuclear war and of deteriorating foreign relations are talked about constantly; consequently, we don't enter adulthood with very many false expectations of life. We aren't as artless as the generations before us who were pushed out of their security into a cold hard world to fend for themselves. We are looking forward to the time, with increasing excitement, when we can make a difference. The youth of America is eager to jump into the middle of life and be counted. We want to do what people say can't be done and then rejoice in our accomplishment. We want world peace. We are striving for a world free of nuclear weapons. We want the South African nation freed from apartheid. We want our children to grow up in a safe and stable environment. America's youths' view of life is one with which Kyle Crishton would agree; for he states:

"Life's a pretty precious and wonderful thing. You can't sit down and let it lap around you. You have to plunge into it; you have to dive through it! You can't save it. You can't store it up; you can't board it in a vault. You've got to taste it; you've got to use it. The more you use, the more you have . . . that's the miracle of it."

We are ambitious. We desire to educate ourselves. We are excited about the future and our lives. We want to live, and we won't settle to just exist. Youth wants to be challenged. We are encouraged push ourselves harder and harder to learn. We can be doctors, astronauts, actors absolutely anything we want to be. There's no stopping us now; for, "we are what we risk—what we dare to tackle and attempt to solve."

A young girl from Maine at only twelve years of age, wrote to the Soviet Union about her fear of a nuclear war between the Soviet Union and the United States. She made world news and eased relations between the two great powers for a short period of time. She was tragically killed this year. She was a success, though, according to her classmates' definition of the word. She was always optimistic and cheerful. She truly lived! She enjoyed life and made a difference in the quality of it for others. She accomplished so much in her short lifetime.

Lately, I have become much more aware of myself than I have ever been before. I'm thrilled to experience life and to broaden my horizons. There's so much to learn, and I want to learn it all. I want to meet people and truly listen to them and have them truly listen to me. I want to encourage people to take advantage of the wondrous gift we have, called life. I want to give them the push that they may need to get involved and help the community. I've realized that today's youth can truly accomplish anything it wants, and I'm ecstatic about my realization.

We are ready to live, in the present, to explore, and to open our minds. We want to experience life without any boundaries or limits. We are free to do anything we want. Buckminster Fuller sums this philospohy up when he states, "I have great hope for tomorrow and my hope lies in the following three things—truth, youth, and love."

PRAIRIE STATE COLLEGE WEEK

HON. GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to announce that the week of May 1, 1986, has been designated as "Prairie State College Week" within the Fourth District of Illinois, a recognition well-deserved by this fine community college.

Located in Chicago Heights, IL, Prairie State College has remained a valued and respected place of learning in our community since its establishment in 1958. Nearly 5,000 residents representing 15 municipalities from the far southern suburbs of Cook County and eastern Will County are enrolled at Prairie State. The college offers more than 50 areas of study in the associate of arts degree program for the student seeking transfer to a 4-year college or university, 30 associate of applied science (2-year degree) programs in occupational and technical areas, and nearly 30 1-year certificate programs.

The college's philosophy of striving to provide educational opportunities to all who seek them in the community embodies what is surely the goal of community colleges across our Nation—the enhancement of the lives of its students through education, thereby enriching America itself. After all, bright and innovative individuals have and always will be the fabric of the progress for which our country is known.

"Prairie State College Week" will be highlighted by a "Special Event" fundraising dinner dance where the guest speaker will be Chicago television hostess and Academy Award nominee Oprah Winfrey with entertainment provided by the Dick Judson Orchestra. Proceeds from the event will benefit the Prairie State College Foundation's Permanent Scholarship Fund and Learning Center project.

I know my fellow colleagues in the House join me in wishing Prairie State College all the best for a successful future.

THE NASA FISCAL YEAR 1987 BUDGET

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, as the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications of the House Science and Technology Committee prepares to mark up the fiscal year 1987 NASA authorization bill, I feel it appropriate to make a few remarks about the future of the American space program.

NASA is at a critical juncture of its existence. Several key developments are likely to result in fundamental changes. The most profound impact, of course, was the tragic loss of the Space Shuttle Challenger. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Emergency Deficit Control Act is also a dark cloud hanging over the entire Federal budget this year, and NASA will be expected to do its share of trimming. On a more promising note is the soon-to-be-released report of the National Commission on Space, with its visionary blueprint for the next 50 years in space. After all is said and done, I hope we will see a stronger NASA, more capable of meeting the challenges of the new frontier, and I believe that a majority of the public and the U.S. Congress shares that hope.

On January 28, the Space Shuttle Challenger accident sent NASA's budgetary process into a tailspin from which it has yet to recover. Since that time, the administration and Congress have been closely examining numerous options about how to proceed. The process has been complex, and much credit must be given to those involved. The Senior Interagency Group for Space [Sig-Space] for weeks has been debating how to replace the lost launch capacity. The Rogers Commission's report on the shuttle accident is also nearing completion. Only after these executive groups arrive at a decision can Congress begin serious consideration of NASA's budget.

With so many uncertainties about NASA's future, the Space Science and Applications Subcommittee of the House Science and Technology Committee plans to markup an authorizing bill tomorrow. Clearly, my colleagues and I on the subcommittee have a particularly difficult job before us. We face this task knowing that any bill reported out of subcommittee may be irrelevent once the administration presents its revised NASA budget reflecting the full impact of the Challenger accident. The bill we report out of committee, to a large extent, will be a message to the administration, rather than a working budget.

I am confident that the President will come forth with a comprehensive proposal to replace the lost shuttle launch capacity. It is my hope the President's plan, once unveiled, will include a supplemental appropriations bill to fund a mix of at least one more shuttle orbiter and complimentary expendable launch vehicles [ELV's].

At markup, however, the Space Subcommittee will be forced to make some assumptions about expected launch capability. In my opinion, those assumptions should be as optimistic as possible, and include the launch vehicle mix mentioned above. If more restrictive budgetary realities present themselves later, then the authorized funds can be adjusted either in full committee, in the Appropriations Committee, or on the House floor.

Despite so many unknowns in the NASA budget, I am confident that under the leadership of Chairman NELSON, the Space Science and Applications Subcommittee will mark up the NASA authorizing bill to reflect what is best for the Nation's Space Program and our continued global leadership in space.

The President's proposed fiscal year 1987 NASA budget was, on the whole, a good program. Funding for the space station will allow the program to proceed to the development phase in early 1987. The development of the orbital maneuvering vehicle will continue on schedule. The ocean topography experiment [Topex], a new start in the NASA fiscal year 1987 request, is a joint United States-French initiative. Topex is an exciting experiment which will give a better understanding of the oceans' general circulation. Space exploration development is progressing on the Magellan Venus radar mapper and the Mars observer mission. I am also excited about funding for the transatmospheric vehicle research and technology development. I am pleased that these elements were included in the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, and I plan to support their full funding throughout this budget cycle.

Mr. Speaker, the heart of the space program is embodied in NASA's R&D function, and in particular the Office of Space Science and Application [OSSA]. The Associate Administrator of OSSA, Dr. Burton I. Edelson, heads the program, which, despite its critical importance, takes only 20 percent of the NASA budget. In Dr. Edelson's testimony to the House Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications he said, "The benefits we have realized from space science and applications in the past have been enormous. Mankind now has a new view of the Universe." The space scientists and engineers conduct basic research into the nature of the "entire universe, with efforts ranging from the most distant galaxies to the neighboring worlds of the solar system, and finally to the land, oceans, and atmosphere of the planet Earth."

Unfortunately, despite the achievements in space science and space applications, there has developed a feeling of frustration and disappointment in the scientific and technical community because many projects have been delayed or canceled due to congressional or executive shortsightedness. In 1981, for example, NASA was forced to make broad, sweeping cuts in the space science program to provide necessary funds for the space shuttle development. Clearly, as a matter of national security, the shuttle had to be completed, but it was counterproductive to force cuts in space R&D as a result. The Nation has consistently used the space science and applications program as the arena for cuts when budget tightening was required. The 1981 decision resulted in postponements and cancellations of dozens of programs. For example, the mission to encounter Comet Halley was dashed; the international Polar orbiter mission was postponed; the advanced communication technology satellite was postponed; and data reception from the Pioneer space probe was terminated—later rescinded.

We may see a similar series of cutbacks in space science and applications programs as a result of the Challenger explosion. The Congressional Budget Office, in a report on the impact of the shuttle accident, suggests that one "area in which to reduce NASA spending over the next 2 to 3 years is the research and development [R&D] function, since the loss of shuttle capacity will lead to a dramatic reduction in shuttle flights available to launch R&D payloads during this period." I strongly urge my colleagues not to be swayed by this argument. To significantly cut this critical Space Science Program would result in the discontinuation of vital research, disbanding of irreplaceable research teams, and a general weakening of America's lead in cutting-edge technology in the world market. We seriously run the risk of gutting the space science and application effort; the result will be inadequate programs to meet the science and applications needs in the 1990's.

Last week, Thomas Donahue, Chairman of the Space Science Board of the National Academy of Science, in testimony before the Senate Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee, observed that:

> This nation has been trying to carry out a highly visible, prestigious national enterprise on the frontier of technology, with a resource level so meager that one tragic accident has crippled the entire program, civil and military * * * I would urge that you resolve to turn the space program around and to either carry on a space program at a level that makes sense for a flagship program for our nation or get out of it altogether and leave it to the Russians.

I think Mr. Donahue makes a convincing case for support for the space program, even in face of the shuttle disaster and Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Now is the time when Congress and the administration must show greater support for NASA and fund it appropriately. Most importantly, we must begin building—or rebuilding—a program now which will lead toward "a flagship" program in the 1990's, as Mr. Donahue suggests.

I am concerned, for example, about those programs in the fiscal year 1987 NASA budget that have been unjustifiably canceled, postponed, or severely cut. In addition to the recommendations contained in the President's NASA budget request, I believe that there are other important areas of the budget that require funding. After consulting with individuals in the major national professional associations and reviewing their testimony before the Space Subcommittee, I have identified a number of programs which I believe require budget enhancement. I will outline those programs in brief below:

ADVANCED COMMUNICATION TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE [ACTS]

ACTS is the latest in a series of NASA experimental communications satellites. The decision to delete this program from the fiscal year 1987 request was irrational. ACTS represents the cutting edge capabilities that will revolutionize future satellite telecommunications. The investment necessary for the technology development of ACTS is not within the R&D means of the communication satellite industry. The payback in hardware sales alone from a $350 million investment by the United States in ACTS is expected to be over 100 to 1. If the United States doesn't follow through on its commitment to the ACTS Program, the private sector will be forced to continue the research at a greatly reduced pace, allowing foreign competitors such as Europe and Japan to develop the technology first.

SOLAR OPTICAL TELESCOPE [SOT]

SOT has been a priority mission of solar physics scientists for a number of years, but, due to congressional and other criticism, the program was dropped. Originally, the SOT proposal was a project requiring several trips on the shuttle and designed so that it would eventually be mounted to the space station. NASA, however, is working on an alternative proposal aimed at keeping the essence of the solar physics, but at much lower cost. I think it would be in the Nation's interest to help

NASA proceed with development of a modified SOT.

ORBITAL TRANSFER VEHICLE [OTV]

There is a clear need for a versatile, cost-effective OTV to exploit space orbits beyond those the shuttle and the space station will be able to reach. The planned OTV will be reusable, space-based, and able to deliver 15,000 pounds of payload to geosynchronous orbit. The OTV will contribute greatly to the efficiency of the space infrastructure, and more emphasis on the program at this time is justified.

MICROGRAVITY RESEARCH

In the rush to commercialize microgravity products, we have, to some extent, ignored basic research in microgravity. Instrumentation in many research labs is obsolete and no longer capable of reaching technology frontiers. Plans for anticipated activities aboard the space station should begin in fiscal year 1987 if the facilities are going to be ready for initial operation capability. Projects such as the automated protein crystal growth facility, the advanced levitation device and the high temperature directional solidification facility should be funded to proceed at a more vigorous pace.

INTERNATIONAL SOLAR-TERRESTIAL PHYSICS PROGRAM [ISTP]

ISTP is an effort to draw on the resources of a worldwide scientific community to make a concentrated and coordinated study of the interaction in the Sun-Earth system, and to extrapolate this knowledge to the other planets and to the universe beyond. The program would be a multinational effort, with participation from NASA (United States), ISA (Japan) and ESA (Europe). The President has only requested $5 million for ESA and ISAS instrumentation. This is an important program that is ready and should be allowed to begin as a new start. It would also demonstrate to our allies that the United States is a reliable space science partner.

COMET RENDEZVOUS AND ASTEROID FLYBY [CRAF]

CRAF is the first in a series of planetary explorers to be flown aboard Mariner Mark II spacecrafts. CRAF is a priority mission of NASA's Solar System Exploration Committee [SSEC]. The SSEC has outlined a series of low-cost planetary missions. CRAF will give us a better understanding of the nature of comets, a valuable followup mission to the Comet Halley rendezvous. If CRAF does not start in fiscal year 1987, the United States will miss the opportunity to study the comet Wild 2—a highly desirable comet because of its pristine qualities. CRAF is a window through which we can see the mysteries of the solar system.

LIFE SCIENCES

During the current fiscal year, the activities in life sciences were significantly cut back. In order to maintain ongoing activities related to near term space flight schedules, the cuts were made in life science research relating to the space station. Crucial work needs to begin in the space station's health care facilities; in bioregenerative life support systems; and in radiation protection for crew members.

I urge my colleagues not to be timid about supporting a more aggressive space program. Whether we have a barely viable American space program or a true "flagship program" depends on the decisions we make in this Congress.

THE COMPUTER FRAUD AND ABUSE ACT OF 1986 (H.R. 4562)

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, on April 10, 1986, I introduced the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act of 1986 (H.R. 4562) along with Congressmen MCCOLLUM and NELSON in the House of Representatives. An identical bill was introduced by Senators TRIBLE and LAXALT in the Senate (S. 2281). This bill is the culmination of 3 years of hearings in the Congress and we believe it meets the problem created by the misuse of our rapidly expanding computer technology.

Our investigation in this area indicates that the computer has become an integral part of our everyday lives. Computers are critical to our national defense, financial institutions, and information transmission. By 1990, in addition to the vast commercial use of computers, it is projected that 80 million home computers will be in use.

Computer technology has brought us a long way in the past decade. However, computer technology—with all its gains—has left us with a new breed of criminal: the technologically sophisticated criminal who breaks into computerized data files. One element of this expanding group of electronic trespassers—the so-called "hacker"—is frequently glamorized by the media, perhaps because the image of the hacker is that of a bright, intellectually curious, and rebellious youth—a modern-day Huck Finn. The fact is these young thrill seekers are trespassers, just as much as if they broke a window and crawled into a home while the occupants were away. The hacker of today can become the white-collar crime superstar of tomorrow, and we must not glamorize our Huck Finns into John Dillingers.

While we need to be concerned about youthful hackers, they pale in significance in comparison to the computer sophisticated criminal who combines his technological skill with old-fashioned greed and criminal intent to rob banks or destroy business records or steal trade secrets. The tools of the trade are not Smith and Wesson, but IBM and Apple. However, in today's world of instant electronic transfer of funds, the result can be more far-reaching—and harder for law enforcement to reach.

What can be done about these crimes? We believe government and industry have a dual responsibility: industry must work to prevent such crimes, and government must be willing and able to prosecute when crimes occur.

The legislation we introduced will expand in an appropriate but limited manner the types of criminal misconduct involving computers that will be subject to Federal jurisdiction. However, we intend that the Federal role be expanded only to those areas where there is a compelling Federal interest in the prevention and punishment of computer crimes. To that end, this bill provides additional protection against computer crimes affecting the Federal Government itself and those activities in which there is a unique Federal interest.

AMENDMENTS TO PRESENT LAW

At present, 18 U.S.C. 1030(a)(1) provides for punishment of thefts by computer of national security-related information. This bill will alter that provision of law only to the extent necessary to simplify the language pertaining to those who "exceed authorized access" to a particular computer system.

The same clarification on "exceed authorized access" will be made in 18 U.S.C. 1030(a)(2) in regard trespass of financial institutions. In addition, 1030(a)(2) will be altered by changing the state of mind requirement from "knowingly" to "intentionally." We are concerned that a "knowingly" standard when applied to computer use and computer technology, might not be sufficient to preclude liability on the part of those who inadvertently "stumble into" someone else's computer file. This is particularly true with respect to those who are authorized to use a particular computer, but subsequently exceed their authorized access by entering another's computer file. It is not difficult to envision a situation in which an authorized computer user will mistakenly enter someone else's computer file because the user had "knowingly" signed onto the computer in the first place. The danger exists that he might incur liability for his mistaken access to another file. The substitution of an "intentional" standard is meant to focus Federal criminal prosecutions under this paragraph on those who evince a clear intent to enter, without authorization, computer files belonging to another.

The premise of 18 U.S.C. 1030(a) (2) in existing law remains the protection, for privacy purposes, of computerized information relating to a customer's relationships with a financial recordkeeper. We believe strongly that the protection offered consumer reporting agency's in the 1984 computer crime legislation must be preserved. This bill will also extend those privacy protections to information on any customer's (including corporations and small businesses) financial records.

This legislation will also clarify the present 18 U.S.C. 1030(a)(3), making clear that it applies to acts of simple computer trespass against computers belonging to, or being used by or for, the Federal Government. To alleviate those concerns, this legislation will make clear that 18 U.S.C. 1030(a)(3) is a trespass offense by "outsiders." "Authorized users" of Federal computers will no longer be covered under this subsection but such misconduct is presently covered by administrative sanction and such laws as the Privacy Act, trade secrets laws, 18 U.S.C. 1361, et cetera. This should also alleviate concerns that first arose in 1984 about disclosures of Government/related information by "whistleblowers" that was stored in a computer. The intentional modification or destruction of computerized information belonging to the Government by outsiders will be covered by a different felony provision of this proposal. As with 18 U.S.C. 1030(a)(2), the state of mind requirement in this paragraph will be changed from "knowingly" to "intentionally."

While the provision of present law relating to attempted offenses will remain unchanged, the provision relating to conspiracies (18 U.S.C. 1030(b) (2)) will be deleted. Conspiracies to commit computer crimes would be covered under the general Federal conspiracy statute, 18 U.S.C. 371.

NEW OFFENSES

The new paragraph section 1030(a) (4) to be created by this bill is aimed at penalizing thefts of property via computer trespass that occur as part of an intent to defraud. It will require a showing that the use of the computer or computers in question was directly related to the intended fraud, and was not merely incidental. To trigger this provision the property obtained by the offender in wrongfully accessing a particualr computer must further the intended fraud, and not be superfluous to it. The mere use of a computer, without obtaining property that furthers the fraud, is not meant to constitute an offense under this provision. This subsection is designed, in part, to help distinguish between acts of theft via computer and acts of computer trespass. In intentionally trespassing into someone else's computer files, the offender obtains at the very least information as to how to break into that computer system. If that is all he obtains, the offense should properly be treated as a simple trespass. But because the offender has obtained the small bit of information needed to get into the computer system, the danger exists that his and every other computer trespass could be treated as a theft, punishable as a felony. We do not believe this is a proper approach to this problem. There must be a clear distinction between computer theft, punishable as a felony, and computer trespass, punishable as a misdemeanor. The element in the new subsection 1030(a)(4), requiring a showing of an intent to defraud, is meant to preserve that distinction, as is the requirement that the property wrongfully obtained via computer furthers the intended fraud.

The new subsection 1030(a)(5) is a malicious mischief provision, and is designed to provide penalties for those who intentionally damage or destroy computerized data belonging to another. Such damage may include an act intended to alter another's computer password, thereby denying him access to his own computerized information. It will be necessary, in proving this offense, that the Government demonstrate that a loss has been incurred by the victim totaling at least $1,000 in a single year. This is necessary to prevent the bringing of felony-level malicious mischief charges against every individual who modifies another's computer data. Some modifications, while constituting "damage" in a sense, do not warrant felony-level punishment, particularly when they require almost no effort or expense to repair. The $1,000 valuation is reasonably calculated to facilitate felony punishment in cases involving more serious damage or destruction. In instances where the requisite dollar amount cannot be shown, misdemeanor-level penalties will remain available against the offender under the trespass subsection. Thus, the valuation will not exist for determining the presence or absence of Federal jurisdiction; it will serve instead to help determine whether the act constituting the offense is punishable as a felony or a misdemeanor.

In addition, the concept of "loss" embodied in this paragraph will not be limited solely to the cost of actual repairs. The Justice Department has suggested that other costs, including the cost of lost computer time necessitated while repairs are being made, be permitted to count toward the $1,000 valuation. I and the other sponsors of this bill agree.

Finally, in new subsection 1030(a)(6), this bill provides a misdemeanor penalty for those who, through what is called "pirate bulletin boards," knowingly and with an intent to defraud, traffic in computer passwords belonging to others. If those elements are present—and if the password in question would enable unauthorized access to a Government computer, or if the trafficking affects interstate or foreign commerce—this provision could be invoked.

Having worked with experts on computer crime over the past several years, we believe the legislation passed last year along with the bill now being considered by the Congress—combined with active efforts of industry to safeguard their property—will address the emergency of the computer criminal in our society.

Protections—both through law and technology—can and must be developed for the intangible property—information—which is the life blood of computer systems.

Unless we act now to secure the "locks" and provide the laws, computer crime will be the crime wave of the next decade.

THE MILLS OF GOD GRIND SLOWLY—BULGARIA AND ITS JEWISH CITIZENS DURING WORLD WAR II

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, the roll of countries which, at great risk, helped their Jewish citizens during World War II is very small, but worthy of honor. Denmark has received fitting tribute for the successful rescue mission of the Danish Jews. But few people realize that Bulgaria, too, saved its large Jewish community consisting of 50,000 people from the horrors of deportation and murder at the hands of the Nazis.

On a recent private visit to Bulgaria, my wife and I had the opportuntity to check out at first hand the Bulgarian record of resistance to Nazi atrocities against the Jewish community. I spoke to members of the government ranging from Deputy Foreign Minister Lyuben Gotsev to Chairman of the Parliament Stanko Todorov, to officials in local governments, to the president of the Bulgarian Jewish community Josiff Levi, as well as to private citizens. They added details to the story and they all agreed that the moral courage manifested by the people of Bulgaria during the dark depraved days of Nazi power was truly extraordinary. Unfortunately, these deeds have been overlooked by the world community.

Although the Axis-allied government of Bulgaria, which was an ally of Hitler's Germany, acquiesced to some degree in the anti-Jewish policies of the Nazis, the Bulgarian people—partisans, representatives in parliament, members of municipal councils, union and church leaders—manifested their opposition to the Nazis. The first abortive attempt to deport Bulgarian Jews aroused a storm of protest. When finally, as a result of constant German pressure, the Bulgarian Government agreed to send the Jews to labor camps, the people sabotaged the effort. On the day the first group of Jews were to be sent away, the partisans crowded into the railroad station and interfered with the deportation.

Other rescue operations included the denial of Jewish origins of their neighbors suspected by the Nazis. One impressive woman I met, Margarita Delina, the vice chairwoman of the district of Plovdiv, told us that when she was a girl, her parents protected several Jews. When Nazi SS troops came to their house and asked the names of their neighbors, her mother changed the Jewish-sounding names to protect them. "I couldn't understand it at the time," she told us, "I asked my mother afterward why she gave the wrong name, but she didn't answer. I found out only after the war."

The efforts on behalf of the Bulgarian Jews took many and varied forms. Mass "mercy-baptisms" took place with both parties knowing that the "convert" would later renounce his vows. There were mixed marriages on a gigantic scale. Josiff Levi, the president of the Jewish community in Bulgaria, remembers Rabbi David Tsion, who organized large rallies at which Bulgarian Jews and non-Jews demonstrated against the transportation of Greek Jews through Bulgaria to "work camps."

In view of the fact that Hitler found eager collaborators in almost all countries allied with or occupied by the Nazis, it is indeed a miracle that in a few places he ran into unified and outraged resistance. Bulgaria was one of those countries. The Bulgarians chose not to become passive bystanders or depraved collaborators. Instead they decided, as a people, to come to the aid of their Jewish neighbors.

The mills of God may grind slowly but they do grind justly. Just as 40 years after the war we are still discovering Nazis who hid their disgraceful past, so we are also discovering, sometimes in the most unexpected places, compassion, sympathy, and bravery on the part of a whole nation who befriended the Jewish people in their moment of greatest danger and abandonment. This is a story that must be told to get a true picture of the nature of the Bulgarian people, in whose homeland the Nazis also tried to perform their infamous atrocities but failed.

Because the Bulgarian public wholeheartedly supported and cooperated with all rescue efforts, Bulgaria has a record second to none in its successful salvation of its entire Jewish population—45,000 of whom returned to Israel after the war, taking with them the warm friendship and farewell of the Bulgarian people among whom they were welcomed and respected during the many years of their exile.

Bulgaria's acts illustrate to me once more that Nazi Germany was not as powerful as the world tried to pretend and that moral courage and determination, whether from an individual like Raoul Wallenberg, or from a small country like Denmark or Bulgaria, could successfully thwart "the final solution."

This is a story that must also be told. As Sholem Ash said:

It is of the highest importance not only to record and recount—both for ourselves and for the future—the evidences of human degradation, but side by side with them to set forth the evidences of human nobility and brotherhood. Let the epic of heroic deeds of courage and caring as opposed by those of hatred, of rescue as opposed to destruction bear equal witness to unborn generations.

PHIL PERLMUTTER ON ISRAEL

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the happier aspects of American politics, in my judgment, is the broad and deep support which exists in the electorate at large, and in our governmental institutions, for an American policy which is strongly supportive of the independence and integrity of the State of Israel.

I believe that this broad support is based essentially on the recognition in this country that the State of Israel is both the nation in the Middle East which most nearly carries out in its governance the ideals which Americans believe ought to be followed, and is also the nation in that area which has been most willing to ally itself with America on important strategic issues. Many people in our country make their foreign policy decisions based largely on moral grounds; others use strategic and geopolitical basis as the foundation of their foreign policy judgments. Given both its strong democratic system and its goal in the world, Israel stands out as a worthy friend of America on both counts.

There are some who try to explain away strong American support for Israel by claiming that a conspiracy of a small number of Jewish Americans somehow exerts a disproportionate financial and media influence, and that this results in American policy being as supportive as it is of Israel. Strangely, some Americans who are among Israel's strongest friends inadvertently give comfort to this argument by exaggerating the extent to which financial contributions must flow to Members of Congress to assure reasonable levels of American foreign assistance for Israel. America provides substantial foreign aid to Israel largely because it makes sense in terms of both America's interest and America's values. The support which many friends of Israel give in this country is helpful, but I do not believe that this support would stand for a great deal if the majority of Americans perceived Israel to be hostile to American interests, either in terms of values or its policies.

This debate is an important one, both with regard to American/Israel relations, and for those who would like to understand American foreign policy in general. For it is not only with regard to Israel that critics of a particular foreign policy relationship like to exaggerate the role played by domestic supporters of a particular country. And ethnic groups—Jewish Americans, black Americans, Greek Americans, Portuguese Americans, and so forth—are often singled out for unfair and inaccurate criticism for their role in foreign policy decisions.

An excellent article was recently published in Present Tense magazine by Philip Perlmutter, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Metropolitan Boston. Mr. Perlmutter is not only a leader in the Jewish community, he is also a scholar of American politics in general, and I believe his thoughtful, cogent, and well-documented essay makes a very important contribution to understanding how American foreign policy in general is formulated, and also why there has been and will continue to be such strong American support for a free and independent Israel.

[From Present Times, Winter 1985-86]

WHAT'S A SPECIAL INTEREST?

(By Philip Perlmutter)

Explaining why he was a nervous wreck, a patient told his psychiatrist he had been attending anti-Defamation League meetings where he had heard reports that anti-Semites were desecrating synagogues; American Jewish Committee meetings where he had learned that Jews were excluded from executive suites of corporations; American Jewish Congress meetings where it was predicted that the wall of church-state separation would be breached by people who wanted to Christianize America, and Jewish federation meetings where there were warnings of Israel's imminent economic collapse.

The psychiatrist urged him to change his way of life and report back in a few weeks. This time, the patient flowed with confidence, exclaiming: "I'm a different person! Now, I attend Ku Klux Klan meetings and hear that Jews control corporate America and the banks. At Christian fundamentalist meetings, I am told that Jerusalem will not fall again. At Arab meetings, I discover that Jews control not only the White House and Congress, but the press as well. And, at a new historical society, I learned that the Holocaust never took place."

"Power, power, who's got the power? One of the most intriguing questions about American minority groups—particularly Jews—has been: How much do they influence American foreign policy? For all the charges and accusations over the years, the historical facts are that ethnic, religious and racial groups never possessed either the political power or the unity ascribed to them, and that when their interests conflicted with those of government, they lost out. More precisely: though ethnic groups often claimed—or others alleged—they successfully influenced foreign policy, the truth was that the Government had decided on policies that generally corresponded with those supported by the ethnic groups—or public opinion. Without such similarities in views, the President or Congress or both have denied loans, grants, sales, agreements and treaties, no matter how strongly minority advocates supported them.

This is not to say that minority groups have little or no influence, because at times they do—particularly before an election, when they can usually have their concerns included in political platforms, and can obtain statements of support and praise. Also, they can trigger public debate and discussion, organize protests and demonstrations, attract media and public attention, and occasionally help achieve but not determine a candidate's election victory. They are weakest when they are the sole advocates of statewide, national or international causes.

Actually, ethnicity is only one factor in political behavior. Others, including age, education, socioeconomic position and—usually most important—issues of the day, also play a part. Moreover, there is a problem of members of ethnic groups differing on domestic and foreign policies.

The history of ethnic petitions, pressures and politics contains many examples of frustrations and failures. The Irish could not prevent an American-British rapprochement at the turn of the century. German-Americans could not keep this country out of World War I. In the early 1920s, Armenian-Americans and their non-Armenian supporters did not prevent the Allies and the United States from signing treaties with Turkey omitting a provision for an independent Armenia; nor could Korea-Americans convince President Wilson to support Korean independence or a League of Nations trusteeship for that country. During World War I and afterward. Ukrainian-Americans could not move the Government to support an independent Ukrainia; nor could Italian-Americans prevent President Roosevelt from stopping exports to Italy when that country invaded Ethiopia. German-Americans and Italian-Americans on the one hand, and Americans of English and French descent on the other, could not keep us out, or bring us into, World War II. Americans of Polish, Czech, Slovak, Lithuanian, Latvian, Slovene, Estonian and Finnish descent could not persuade the United States to liberate their homelands from Soviet influence or domination, nor could they keep America from signing the Helsinki agreements, which, in effect, legitmated post-World War II Soviet expansionism. Cuban-Americans did not succeed in getting President Kennedy to remain committed to unseating Fidel Castro or to maintain support of their secret military forces in Miami. Greek- and Armenian-Americans did not sway Presidents Ford, Carter and Reagan from opposing a Congressional arms embargo on Turkey. Similarly, neither Chinese, Turkish, Lebanese, African nor other groups of Americans could move the American Government to take actions that were not considered in this country's best interests.

In the case of American Jews, who are frequently credited with having the strongest ethnic lobby, Professor Nadav Safran of Harvard University has pointed out that while the United States Government has extended much economic and military aid to Israel, it has also denied aid on many occasions. Thus, before the 1967 Six-Day War, Jewish as well as public sympathy for Israel could not induce the Government to support an alliance guaranteeing Israel's security. Nor were American Jews able, for many years, to move the Government to pressure Arab countries to cease their economic boycott of Israel, and to stop barring Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal. They were unable to dissuade the Government from providing Arab countries with military and economic aid, and they could not get Secretary of State John Foster Dulles to support arms sales to Israel to counter Arab military threats.

Subsequently, increased American support for Israel was not, in Safran's words, "so much due to any reassertion of Jewish influence or changes of Administration as it was to changes of circumstances in the Middle East which altered the conception of the United States' interest in the area and Israel's role in relation to it." This also helps explain the Carter Administration's massive sale of warplanes to Saudi Arabia and Egypt in 1978, ignoring Israeli and American Jewish opposition.

All the same during Congressional debate on the sale, charges of dual loyalty and ethnic politics were directed against Jews. (It is too early to tell whether the recent espionage cases involving ethnic Americans—Larry Wu-Tai Chin, a Chinese-American accused of spying for Communist China, and Jonathan Jay Pollard, an American Jew accused of passing secrets to Israel—will reignite such charges of dual loyalty.) Sensitive to the odious implications of these accusations, Republican Senator Robert Packwood of Oregan upheld the right of all citizens and members of Congress to oppose certain policies without being called "a Polish lobby or a Czechoslovakian lobby or a Bulgarian lobby . . ."

Moreover, he said, "I have not heard anyone in this country accusing the Americans of Greek ancestry in this country of being disloyal Americans because they are upset with the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. Nor has anyone accused the blacks in this country of disloyalty because of their natural affinity for the cause of human liberties in Africa. Nor did anyone criticize those of Hungarian extraction in this country who were quite upset about the return of the Crown of St. Stephen to Hungary. All of those groups are loyal Americans who put America first, but they have an understandable interest in the homeland of their forefathers."

Three years later, in a replay of the 1978 sale, the Reagan Administration decided to sell five AWACS radar planes and other sophisticated military equipment to Saudi Arabia. Again, Jewish organizations strongly opposed the sale and, again, some political leaders accused them of unfair lobbying, while remaining silent about strong pro-Saudi lobbying by military-industrial-oil pressure groups. "It is not the business of other nations to make American foreign policy," said President Reagan, alluding to Israel. Moved to anger, Democratic Senator Alan Cranston of California charged that Israel was being made a "scapegoat" for the Reagan Administration's mistakes in promoting the sale. "By accusing the Israeli Government of interfering in American politics, by raising the specter of domestic anti-Semitism, by impugning the motives and patriotism of members of the U.S. Senate, the Reagan Administration is doing a gross disservice to our democratic institutions, to the freedom of speech and debate, to our constitutional process—and to our country."

Former President Nixon also stirred up much comment when he asserted: "We know, the Saudis know and everyone in the Middle East knows that if it were not for the intense opposition by [Prime Minister Menachem] Begin and part of the American Jewish community, the sale would go through." American Jews and many others were outraged.

Though it supported the sale, The Washington Post editorialized that "Other nations make American foreign policy every day of the week, just as we, by our actions, make theirs . . . . Does anyone think the wishes of the People's Republic of China, the Government of Taiwan, the South Africans, the Japanese or—to take a not-so-random case—the Saudi Arabians have not, in some very important respects, 'made' American foreign policy?"

Months later, stung by Jewish and public criticism for having introduced ethnic prejudice in the AWACS debate, Reagan retreated, proclaiming every American's "full right and obligation to participate" in shaping Government policy. He added: "Every citizen and every citizen's group is guaranteed the right to speak out—and must be encouraged to do so without fear of reprisal or defamation. No group should be bullied into silence by racial or ethnic slurs, or the fear of them. The language of hate—the obscenity of anti-Semitism and racism—must have no part in our national dialogue."

Even so, innuendos and accusations of massive Jewish political influence persisted. Yet such influence was denied by various experts. Then Under Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger commented that it was "insane" to claim that a "pro-Israel lobby" in Washington is responsible for American support of Israel. Further, he explained, "There are many reasons why the United States has an interest in having the right kind of relationship with Israel . . . . Our strategic interest is well served by a strong, self-reliant Israel. It provides us with an anchor in the Middle East, which we would not otherwise have."

Even so vehement a critic of Israel as Professor Noam Chomsky of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology noted: "Had it not been for Israel's perceived geopolitical role—primarily in the Middle East, but elsewhere as well—it is doubtful that the various pro-Israeli lobbies in the U.S. would have had much influence."

And recently, Earl Raab, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council in San Francisco, and sociologist Seymour Martin Lipset of Stanford University argued in "The Political Future of American Jews" that, at best, "Jewish political influence is marginal" in affecting "the concordance of American values and Jewish values, despite Jewish political contributions and activism, strong voting patterns, and involvement in business and community life."

Whatever the ethnic group, it is not surprising that its leaders seek to influence American foreign policy, wrote the political scientist Louis Gerson in 1964 in his brilliant study. "The Hyphenate in Recent American Politics and Diplomacy," covering the years 1890 to 1956. What was astonishing, he added, was that they had not been "more effective, more active, and more decisive in their attempts to involve or implicate the United States in non-American affairs." As the political scientist G. Lowell Field described the situation in the introduction to Gerson's book: "When the chips are down, no President or Secretary of State will risk national survival in an effort to honor a campaign pledge to an ethnic minority. . . . No more than any other power do we involve ourselves in major conflicts on purely sentimental considerations. Thus appeals to ethnic groups are likely to turn out to be insincere. Not policy but the mere promise of policy was traded for votes. The ethnic whose effective weight in American politics seems to be assured by a success in influencing the phrasing of policy in favor of his foreign sympathies thus finds himself a dupe."

Three cases in recent years illustrate such behavior: In December 1978, many Chinese-Americans were disappointed when President Carter established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, thereby weakening American ties with the Nationalist Chinese Government in Taiwan. In an open letter published in The New York Times, they reminded the President of his 1976 election campaign promise: "We are bound by a treaty to guarantee the freedom of Formosa, Taiwan, the Republic of China. I wouldn't go back on the commitment that we have had to assure that Taiwan is protected from military takeover."

In 1979, the Coalition of Mexican-Americans stated in a full-page ad in The Los Angeles Times: "We are Mexican-Americans to whom you made many promises when you were campaigning for the Presidency in 1976. In our view, you have kept none of those promises." And the same year, at the convention of the American Hellenic Educational Program Association, George Christopher, a prominent Greek-American and former Mayor of San Francisco, criticized President Carter for allegedly not living up to his preelection promises about Cyprus. Christopher said he had told the President that some people were questioning Greek-Americans' patriotism because they had criticized him, and that he had said: "Mr. President, perhaps you too are not a good American, because up until a few days ago you were with us."

There is no doubt that such ethnic group disenchantment with President Carter helped produce Ronald Reagan's landslide victory in 1980. The disenchantment involved foreign as well as domestic policy, and was even more evident in the 1984 election, when Reagan won a clear plurality of votes from all major ethnic groups except Jews, who were more concerned by Reagan's church-state views than his stand on Israel.

Yet, no matter how ethnic groups voted, each, invariably, will be disappointed should the Administration (and/or Congress) define the national interest in terms contrary to the interests of that particular group. And, as history has shown, that has often been the case, regardless of pressures from ethnic groups.

JASON MUSSER RECEIVES EAGLE SCOUT AWARD

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this time to express my congratulations to Jason Matthew Musser of Grantville, PA, who will receive the Boy Scout Eagle Award on Saturday, April 26, 1986. This event is always a special time for the family and friends of a man who receives such an award because it is a recognition of his dedication to his community and country.

Jason, a junior honor student at Lower Dauphin High, is a member of Boy Scout Troop 27. He began the scouting program as a Cub Scout and has worked his way through Webelos and Boy Scouts. At Lower Dauphin High School he is an active member of the track team. Jason also serves as the treasurer of the youth group at Grantville's Shell Lutheran Church, where he is also a lay reader and has been the church custodian since age 13.

Jason Musser has shown excellent service and leadership capabilities in his work with the Scouts and should be congratulated for earning this very distinguished achievement. I wish him good luck and great success in his future endeavors.

ILLEGAL ALIENS CAN BE TERRORISTS OR SPIES

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, all of us are aware of the massive influx of illegal aliens into this country. Few or us think of the alien community as a possible source of terrorists and spies. Obviously, we must act quickly before those who want to bring terrorism to our country succeed.

While much has been said about terrorism directed against Americans overseas, little has been said about the likelihood of terrorist acts here in the United States in retaliation for United States military operations against Libyan terrorist camps and military targets.

The huge illegal alien community undoubtedly has a number of foreign terrorists who have been sent to this country for reasons other than finding economic opportunity and escaping from political oppression. In the event of a clash between the United States and a terrorist-supporting state, instructions could be sent to these terrorists and they could be quickly mobilized to undertake domestic terrorist operations.

Spies masquerading as illegal aliens are an equal threat. They, too, could be called upon by their foreign masters to work against America's security interests.

While illegal immigration to this country is in itself a critical problem, the fact that this alien community probably contains spies and terrorists adds another dimension to the problem.

Fortunately, the administration has begun to focus on the possible threat of domestic terrorism. The FBI and other concerned agencies have mobilized resources and have undertaken appropriate contingency planning should this domestic terrorist threat materialize. Now is clearly the time to do something about illegal immigration to the United States.

With these concerns in mind, I commend the following Christian Science Monitor article to my colleagues in the Congress.

ILLEGAL ALIENS CAN BE TERRORISTS OR SPIES

(By John Dillin)

A number of US officials are quietly warning that America's porous borders have become an open invitation to world terrorists and spies.

Officials are particularly troubled by the growing number of aliens filtering illegally into the United States from radical or communist nations, including Iran, China, Cuba, and Poland.

"We are worried about the national-security aspects," particularly communist infiltration, a federal intelligence specialist says.

Officials also warn that radical nations that support terrorism could easily slip saboteurs and assassins past the thinly guarded borders with either Mexico or Canada.

Not all intelligence experts share these worries.

William E. Colby, former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, says America's very openness is a protection and a strength against spies. As for terrorism, he says, there is a basic rule: "If it gets serious, it gets suppressed—either decently, or indecently."

While terrorism could cause some disruption in the US, Mr. Colby says, he doubts that it poses a basic threat to the nature of American society.

Still, several developments have added to the anxiety being expressed here by some government sources:

"Thousands and thousands" of official American passports have been stolen over a period of months from US embassies in the Mideast, Africa, and East Asia. Presumably, most of these passports will be sold on the black market to people who wish to work in the US. But many could be used to smuggle terrorists and spies into this country. "It's frightening," a federal intelligence official says.

Illegal immigration from Mexico has surged by 50 percent in the past few months. Resources of the US Border Patrol are being severely strained.

"Narco-terrorism" is increasing. The recent assassination of a US drug informant in Baton Rouge, La., by a Colombian hit squad that entered this country illegally could signal stepped-up criminal terror. The killers slipped into the US at the Mexico-California border.

Document forgery has become more sophisticated. Recently, two heroin smugglers arrested in Miami were found to possess phony security badges, complete with photos and validation, for Miami International Airport.

Sen. Barry Goldwater (R) of Arizona, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, says the evidence causes him "concern." Sen. Alan K. Simpson (R) of Wyoming says: "You could take a crack outfit of 100 people, sprinkle them in through the borders . . . and they could meet at some predetermined point. [They could] pick up their equipment on this side of the border. . . . We wouldn't even know what was going on."

Amitai Etzioni, director of the Center for Policy Research at George Washington University, says Americans seem asleep to the threat that "able-bodied spies" can cross the Rio Grande as easily as maids seeking work in Texas border towns.

"We still haven't adapted from the 18th-century notion that we are safe, and nobody can lay a glove on us—that the oceans will protect us," says Dr. Etzioni.

US Customs Commissioner William von Raab warns that Mexican law-enforcement officials are being corrupted by drug smugglers. He adds that Mexican "law enforcement . . . can just as easily be bought by terrorists." He calls the breakdown of law enforcement a "serious national-security concern." And he observes: "This is a terrorist threat by every definition."

Sen. Malcolm Wallop (R) of Wyoming notes: "The border is indefensible against deliberate peasants who simply want a better life. . . . Think what happens when the PLO trains little teams to come into this country, like they have in Israel, and destroy a schoolbus full of children, or senior citizens on holiday, or blow up a bridge." He warns that eventually, terrorism could undermine "the freedoms that we take for granted."

There are no easy answers to all of this, the experts say. Dr. Etzioni says the immediate need is to educate the American public to the threats of the late 20th century, when jet travel and other modern devices shrink the time it takes to move around the world.

Senator Simpson, at a breakfast meeting with reporters, fretted that it may take some terrible terrorist attack to awaken the US.

Patrick Burns, a researcher for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, says the terrorist and spy problem defies easily solution. Immigration reform will help, but it's not the complete answer.

Alan Nelson, commissioner of the US Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), says there has been some talk about "building a wall" along the 2,000-mile southern border with Mexico to counter terrorism. "I don't think that's very wise, or very practical," he says. But he considers the situation serious. US intelligence agents report that aliens from 82 nations have been detected crossing the Mexican border in the past year.

"We have been working closely with the other agencies in this whole antiterrorism campaign," Mr. Nelson says. "Clearly, the ability of terrorists to get through the southern border is a fact we have to be alert to."

Immigration officials say the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, and Interpol issue alerts to INS border guards when it is known that specific terrorists are trying to slip into the country.

But a federal intelligence expert asks: "How many of them come in under their own names, with their own legitimate passports? It obviously doesn't always work."

The issue of spies and terrorism is complicated by the millions of people who attempt to enter the US illegally for jobs each year.

An immigration official in Los Angeles says federal agents are so busy (1.8 million arrests are predicted this year along the Mexican border) that "the chances of checking people out in any detail is almost impossible." The problem appears to be worsening. The smuggling of people into the US has become a booming business in Asia, Europe, and Latin America. For a charge of $4,000 to $5,000, smugglers arrange illegal visas and other documents necessary for entry.

A telegram sent last year from INS headquarters to its field offices around the world illustrates the sophistication of the smugglers. The telegram said a Philippine smuggling syndicate had begun to move Filipinos through Europe, and then into East Coast US cities, rather than the traditional West Coast entry points. It explained that the syndicate "is using East Coast ports of entry for its clients because INS on the East Coast, particularly New York, is allegedly less vigilant against fraudulent Philippine travel documents."

Gary Imhoff, who writes on immigration matters, cautions that the US displays an "arrogant assumption of our own invulnerability." He then adds: "Guarding a nation's border is a single, seamless job. The borders cannot remain open to illegal immigration and still be guarded against smuggling and terrorists."

PRISONER OF CONSCIENCE IOSIF BERENSHTEIN

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today as part of the congressional call to conscience to again bring to the attention of my colleagues the plight of Iosif Berenshtein, who has been imprisoned in the Soviet Union for over 14 months. In fact, it is a little over 1 year ago today that I first adopted Iosif Berenshtein and sent a letter cosigned by 70 of my colleagues to Secretary Gorbachev asking that he and his family be allowed to emigrate to Israel and join their family there.

I would like to review Mr. Berenshtein's story for my colleagues. Iosif Berenshtein, his wife Fanya and their daughter Yanna, applied for an exit visa to Israel in 1979. After being subjected to a campaign of harassment, Mr. Berenshtein was arrested and sentenced to 4 years in a labor camp. Iosif was put into a prison cell with two hardened criminals and was attacked by them with a piece of broken glass. Mrs. Berenshtein believes this attack was encouraged by Soviet authorities.

As a result of the attack, and because the prison authorities refused Mr. Berenshtein to receive timely medical treatment, Iosif has totally lost his vision in one eye. At the beginning of 1985, Mr. Berenshtein was transferred to Zheltie Vody prison camp in Donetsk. Mr. Berenshtein's health is deteriorating. Fanya Berenshtein recently visited her husband in prison. This visit had finally occurred after months of broken promises. Although Mr. Berenshtein is a diabetic, the prison authorities did not allow his wife to bring him medication for his diabetes.

Mr. Berenshtein has now completed one-third of his sentence. After a prisoner has completed the first third of his or her sentence, it is common in the Soviet Union to allow the prisoner to work for the national economy. Usually this work is of a less physically demanding nature. However, the prison officials told Fanya that even if the courts were to approve such a transfer in Iosif's case, they would never allow it.

Mr. Speaker, Jewish people around the world will soon be celebrating Passover, a festival of freedom. It is traditional that the end of the seder all present say "Next Year in Jerusalem." But for the Jews in the Soviet Union, this is all but a hopeless prayer, if it can even be uttered at all. The Soviet Union's closed emigration policies and their harassment of human rights activists continue. The Congress must continue its vigilance and its commitment to work for freedom for Soviet Jews. We have had some important successes, but our job is far from over. I urge my colleagues to join me in pledging their time and their effort to securing freedom for Soviet Jewry and urging the leaders of the Soviet Union to honor the Universal Declaration on Human Rights to which they are a signatory.

ANOTHER HONOR FOR DESMOND TUTU

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, the news we hear from South Africa is usually that of continuing strife, repression, and potential revolution. Young blacks have increased their demands for equality, and many segments of the white community have begun to accept the notion of reform to varying degrees. Unfortunately, the whites who hold real power have consistently refused to yield to internal or external pressures.

It was therefore with great pleasure that I became aware of the election of Bishop Desmond Tutu to the position of Archbishop of Cape Town. This office is one which gives him authority over the Anglican Church in all of southern Africa.

Bishop Tutu last year became Johannesburg's first black bishop, quite an honor in the world's most racist country. His investment was a signal to South African authorities that the influential Anglican Church would no longer remain neutral in the fight against apartheid. Clergy and lay members are now at the forefront of the freedom movement, laying the groundwork for a peaceful transfer of power.

Mr. Speaker, the new Archbishop will certainly be heard at the highest levels of the South African Government. His influence will be enhanced, and he will be more able to pursue his agenda of peaceful change in South Africa.

I commend him, and wish him Godspeed.

CONGRESSIONAL ARTS CAUCUS HONORS JACK LEMMON

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, today the Congressional Arts Caucus paid tribute to Jack Lemmon. We honored him on a day we were debating the grave issues of war and peace, when we were surrounded by unsettling world events—and it was most appropriate.

We spend a lot of time here, worrying about the affairs of State and of Nations. Sometimes we get so buried in our rhetoric that we forget who we govern. All of us represent millions of American citizens, and all of them are Jack Lemmon. Jack Lemmon has made a career of portraying Everyman—the hilarious, yet determined, musician in "Some Like It Hot," the harassed, confused businessman in "Save the Tiger," the fastidious Felix in "The Odd Couple," the tormented advertising executive in "Days of Wine and Roses," and the brooding James Tyrone in "Long Day's Journey Into the Night."

Jack Lemmon has shown us the beauty and simple majesty that is inside every man and woman. For every dollar we spend on defense, there is an Ensign Pulver, with this own heroes and villains. For every speech we make about textile trade, there is a clothing merchant in Los Angeles who wonders whether to save his business or save the tiger. For every prisoner in a Soviet gulag, there is a prisoner on Second Avenue.

The point is, Jack Lemmon is all of us, and that makes him special. He is a gifted man, and a uniquely gifted actor. His film credits alone read like everybody's list of their favorite movies. He has received Academy Awards, Emmy Awards, The Broadway Drama Guild Award, and I think we can assume the only reason he never won the Heisman Trophy is because he decided not to. He is in Washington at the National Theatre doing Eugene O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey into the Night," an incredibly powerful drama, and, again, a story of a man and his family.

Jack Lemmon has held a mirror up in front of us and shown us what we look like with love and affection. It was only right that we took time from more weighty or pressing issues to honor the man who has shown us America and Americans, with all their fears and foibles, and their prides and passions. He has shown us that nobody's triumph is minor, and nobody's defeat is insignificant.

Thanks to Jack Lemmon we will never forget that America is made up of millions of people whose happiness depends on crosstown traffic and whose biggest victory is throwing a palm tree overboard. And therefore, we honored all of those characters as we honored Jack Lemmon, and thanked him for giving them to us.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask that a correction be made to my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD concerning the centennial year of the gasoline-powered automobile. I stated in error that a U.S. patent was issued which is incorrect, the patent was issued in Germany. Also, I would like to express my appreciation to UMI Productions of Santa Barbara, CA, for its help and special interest in this legislation.

BERT KAUFMAN: THE "PERSON OF THE YEAR"

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues one of our outstanding citizens of Westchester County, NY.

In fact, Bert Kaufman has become such a pillar of the community that this Friday night the Eastchester Chamber of Commerce is honoring him as "Person of the Year" at their 1986 dinner dance.

Bert Kaufman owns and operates "Mr. Burt's Cleaners" in Eastchester, and is affectionately known as "Mr. Burt" throughout the region.

"Mr. Burt" is the type of man who can be called upon in a moment's notice whenever a kind heart or busy hands are needed. For instance, he dropped everything to play Santa Claus for area children, without a word of complaint about how busy the Christmas season is for his business. His devotion to veteran's groups has become legendary. His employees are under orders to clean the flags of any veterans post that requests it, free of charge.

Burt Kaufman is active in the B'nai B'rith of Westchester County, and is the bulwark of their scholarship fund for deserving students.

Burt Kaufman is not any flamboyant character garnering a lot of headlines but accomplishes little. He is a quiet, determined community leader who works behind the scenes for a better community and a better world.

To Burt, his wife Sylvia, and his son, Steven and his many friends and admirers who will gather to honor him, I invite my colleagues to join me in extending our heartiest greetings and gratitude for a job well done.

TRIBUTE TO HAROLD HOLT

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1986, the Snyder County Extension Service will pay tribute to a man who has served as director of the service for the past 18 years. Harold A. Holt began his career with the extension service in May 1959 as a county agent for Huntingdon County. In October 1968 Harold became the director of the Snyder County Extension Service where he specialized in dairy production. He served the dairymen of Snyder and Union Counties as the DHIA adviser, adviser to the Holstein Association, adviser to the 4-H Clubs in Snyder and Union Counties and conducted numerous classes and short courses for dairymen.

Mr. Holt was honored in 1982 by the National Association of County Agents with the Outstanding Service Award for his work in the service. Harold Holt has been a vital member of the extension service for more than 18 years and will be missed greatly by all those associated with the service. I would like to join with all those involved in the extension service in thanking Mr. Holt for his dedication and service to the people of Snyder and Union Counties and wishing him good health and happiness in his retirement.

NATIONAL FOOD BANK WEEK

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House of Representatives passed House Joint Resolution 234, a resolution I introduced designating the week of May 18 as National Food Bank Week.

This resolution, which commemorates food banks across the country, could not have been possible without the help of my distinguished colleagues on the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee: Chairman BILL FORD and Chairman ROBERT GARCIA as well as the distinguished Representatives, the Honorable GENE TAYLOR and the Honorable JAMES HANSEN. I would also like to point out that my office received countless hours of support and hard work from Mr. Scott Broock, during his service as a Washington Workshops student intern. Scott did an outstanding job in helping us sign up over 220 cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 234.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 234 designates May 18 to 24, 1986 as "National Food Bank Week." These dates coincide with the National Conference to be held by Second Harvest, Inc., the largest food bank network in the country.

Food banks play an increasingly important role in our communities across the country. Food banks collect surplus food that would otherwise be wasted and distribute it to soup kitchens, day care centers, homes for the elderly, halfway houses, church-operated food programs, and needy individuals. These are nonprofit organizations who obtain their food primarily from private-sector sources.

In recent years, we have witnessed an appalling increase in poverty and hunger in this country. Over 35.5 million people are poor, and estimates are that over 20 million people in our country periodically go hungry.

Food banks work with private-sector companies, including our food and transportation industries, to respond to that need. In 1985, the Second Harvest network worked with over 250 private-sector companies to distribute over 100 million pounds of food products. This is an excellent example of private sector response to a serious need.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these nonprofit food banks deserve to be commended. They work quietly in communities across the country to eradicate hunger and poverty. I am pleased that my colleagues in the House of Representatives joined me in passing National Food Bank Week.

THE LOSS OF CAPT. FERNANDO A. RIBAS

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the 3.5 million citizens of Puerto Rico I represent, I would like to express our sorrow at the apparent loss of the airplane piloted by Capt. Fernando A. Ribas Dominicci, a native of Utuado, Puerto Rico in the incidents in Lybia on April 15.

Mr. Speaker, as we mourn for the loss of a fellow patriotic American citizen of Puerto Rico, we are justly proud of his service. Puerto Ricans, as always, since the days of World War II have been in the forefront of our national defense, giving their lives in disproportionate numbers to defend our democratic system.

The people of Puerto Rico, Mr. Speaker, offer their condolences to the bereaved family of our hero, Capt. Fernando A. Ribas, and share this sad loss with our fellow American citizens.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE 15TH STREET ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the 15th Street Elementary School in San Pedro, CA, which will be celebrating its 85th year of continuous service to the community at a luncheon on April 25, 1986. Coincidentally, the observance also falls during the Public School Month celebrations.

Built at a cost of just $25,000 on the original site of the San Pedro High School, the 15th Street Public School has achieved a number of tremendous successes in its 85 years. The San Pedro community is indebted to this great school for the fine work it has done in educating its children. The school, which is the second largest of the 13 elementary schools in San Pedro, however, has done more than merely educate our young people. The 15th Street Elementary School has the oldest existing parents-teachers association in California, which is the second oldest such organization in the entire country. Additionally, the school, through its various programs, brings about $500,000 in State and Federal funds into the community.

My wife, Lee, joins me in recognizing the achievements of the 15th Street Elementary School on its 85th anniversary, and in recognizing the many contributions that its students, staff and graduates have made to San Pedro and other southern California communities. I would also like to take a moment to recognize the staff and faculty of the 15th Street Elementary School on the fine work they are doing under the leadership of their principal, Stanley Bunyan.

BIOMEDICAL ENGINEERING

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, the miracles of modern medicine have advanced to a degree that many of us never expected in our lifetimes. There are medications to relieve pain and cure illness; vaccines have virtually eradicated most dangerous childhood diseases; healthy organs can be transplanted to replace certain diseased organs.

But for the thousands of Americans who are paralyzed as result of spinal chord injuries and who bravely face life confined to beds and wheelchairs, the outlook for walking again has never looked promising. Mr. Speaker, today there is hope that paralyzed individuals will someday be able to walk.

I am proud to bring to the attention of my colleagues the work of Dr. Chandler Phillips of Tipp City, OH. Dr. Phillips and his partner, Dr. Gerald Petrofsky of Dayton, OH, were recently nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize in medicine for their work in restoring ambulation to paralytics.

Dr. Phillips has worked for many years at Wright State University in Dayton to help develop a portable computerized walking system for the paralyzed. This effort has already yielded remarkable results.

Last summer, Wright State University student Nan Davis was able to walk a few steps toward her diploma aided by a portable computer unit which controlled electrical stimulation to her paralyzed legs muscles. Another student, Susan Steele, has become the first quadriplegic to walk with the Petrofsky-Phillips system.

Dr. Phillips and Dr. Petrofsky are continuing their work with unique forms of physical therapy designed to improve muscle size, strength, and endurance. This system, aided by continuing research into computer miniaturization and implants, is bringing the miracle of walking to those who are presently paralyzed.

I invite my colleagues to join me in congratulating Dr. Chandler Phillips and Dr. Gerald Petrofsky on their incredible breakthrough in the new field of biomedical engineering and wishing them continued success in their work.

UNITED STATES RESPONSE TO LIBYA WAS APPROPRIATE

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, the United States has made it clear that, as the leader of the free we will not tolerate outrageous terrorism. We cannot allow vicious and mindless terrorism to threaten American lives, nor can we allow a climate of fear to prevail at home or in free nations abroad. The administration has definite evidence that Libya is responsible for American deaths, and that numerous similar terrorist acts have been planned. In retaliating against Libya as we did last night, we have given fair warning that attacks against Americans will be met with strong, self-defensive action. There is no place for terrorism in today's civilized world. I regret that it was necessary for such serious steps to be taken, but it is obvious that Qadhafi will not respond to diplomatic negotiations. Under the circumstances, I believe that the United States response to Libya was entirely appropriate.

BUEFORD FOEGE RETIRES FROM ITHACA BOARD OF EDUCATION

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, Bueford Foege, president of the Ithaca Board of Education of Richland Center, WI, and a school board member for the past 50 years, has announced his retirement with the expiration of his present term.

Mr. Foege began his school board tenure in 1936 as a member of the Smyth Hollow Board, serving the district continuously for the next 20 years. In 1956 he was named to the old Ithaca Union High School Board; and when the district disbanded and reorganized as a K–12 unit in 1965, Foege was elected president. Except for a 3-year period when he was slowed by a heart condition, he has been president ever since. Bueford Foege was the driving force in the reorganization of the Ithaca district as it presently stands.

Bueford Foege has served education in many capacities. He was elected to the Cesa 14—now Cesa 3—Board of Control in 1965, retiring from that position in 1985 after 20 years of service, several of which were spent as agency president. Foege also served a 3-year term on the district boundaries appeals board. Bueford Foege is highly recognized throughout the State of Wisconsin for his lifelong contribution to education and youth. He and his wife Helena will be feted at a retirement dinner at Arthur's in Spring Green on April 18.

We will all miss him but wish him the best in his retirement.

THE IMPORTANCE OF ADOPTION

HON. H. JAMES SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss the importance of adoption.

It is an unfortunate fact that in today's society thousands of young women from all walks of life become unwillingly pregnant. Many of these women, because of economic, social, and emotional pressures, become desperate and unhappy, and grab the first solution that comes along.

However, there is another solution, which not only frees the mother from the responsibilities of parenting, but brings job to those who cannot have children of their own. This solution is adoption. There are a multitude of people in this country who ache to give one or more children a home and love.

Unfortunately for these people, the availability and advantages of adoption have not received the widespread attention they deserve. I myself have witnessed the roadblocks and lack of information in this area. My sister and her husband wanted to adopt a child badly. However, a host of questions awaited them once they reached their decision. Among these were: Who should they contact? How could they learn more about adoption? What were the laws? and Why were the waiting lists so long? All of these questions were hard to find the answers to, as there was such a dearth of helpful information.

It is my hope that through efforts by groups such as the Congressional Coalition on Adoption, of which I am a member, that the American public can become better informed about the advantages of adoption. Perhaps when prospective mothers learn more about adoption, and the happiness it brings, they will be more willing to choose this route instead of the tragedy of abortion. And, as prospective parents become better informed adoption, they will actively pursue this choice and homes will be found for many of the "special needs" children still waiting.

CONFERENCE ON HEALTH CARE AND CATASTROPHIC INSURANCE

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a forum being held in my congressional district on an important and timely national issue. On May 3, 1986, the United Labor Council of Reading and Berks County and the United Steelworkers of America will conduct an all-day conference on our health care system and the urgent need for a national catastrophic insurance plan. Cochairmen of the meeting will be Charles C. Husson, chairman of the Community Services Committee of the United Labor Council, and Jack R. Unangst, chairman of the Legislative Education Committee of the United Steelworkers Local 3733.

The issue of affordable health care is vital to Americans and I want to commend Mr. Husson and Mr. Unangst for their leadership in bringing together the knowledge and insight of their organizations to help formulate policy recommendations on a national catastrophic health insurance plan.

The need for catastrophic insurance is well-established. When a person's entire financial base and life savings, earned through hard work and sacrifice, can be destroyed because of a long hospital stay or a protracted illness, we can only conclude that an important component of our social insurance system is missing.

The President acknowledged this absence in his last State of the Union message when he called on Secretary of Health and Human Services, Dr. Otis R. Bowen, to determine by the end of this year "how the private sector and Government can work together to address the problems of affordable insurance for those whose life savings would otherwise be threatened when catastrophic illness strikes."

We in the Congress support the creation of catastrophic health insurance and several legislative proposals have been introduced. While there is bipartisan agreement on the need and merit for a catastrophic support system, we are still debating how the system should be structured: Should it be a private sector initiative; should it be administered by the Federal Government, through Medicare; or should it be a joint Federal-State effort. These questions remain the basis of the public policy debate on this crucial issue.

I look forward to this conference. As the leadership and membership of these two important organizations discuss the details and the complexities of health care reform, I am certain many valuable recommendations and proposals will be forthcoming. I commend this forum and anticipate that it will make a valuable contribution to our ongoing effort to develop a comprehensive national catastrophic health insurance plan.

JOSEPH H. KANTER JOGGING AND FITNESS CENTER ON THE MALL

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 16, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for many decades my constituents have seen one of Miami's foremost businessmen pounding the pavement and the beaches. Long before it was fashionable, Joe Kanter was an exercise enthusiast and a jogger. In over 40 years, his cumulative mileage now totals the circumference of the Earth.

Joe Kanter is chairman of one of our local bank holding companies. He was one of the first major developers of the "new town" concept. More recently, he has become a film producer, and we are hopeful that some of the benefit that Miami has realized from television production will be mirrored in the movies.

He is also a respected philanthropist, and 2 years ago, he offered to donate a fitness facility, on the U.S. Mall, to the people of America. This exercise installation, with equipment manufactured by Parcourse, Ltd., has been specially designed and built to accommodate the handicapped.

The new fitness center will be dedicated at 11 a.m. on Wednesday, April 23, 1986, at the site, which is located at the intersection of Fourth Street and Independence Avenue, SW. Many of our colleagues are already using the facility, and I hope to see you there.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Wednesday, April 26, 1986, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 17, 1986

The House met at 11 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray in the words of John Greenleaf Whittier:

"Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our foolish ways;
Reclothe us in our rightful mind,
In purer lives Thy service find,
In deeper reverence praise.

"Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace."

Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4551. An act to extend for 3 months the emergency acquisition and net worth guarantee provisions of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982.

BEN WEST

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, this week will mark the passing of an era in the Press Gallery as the House marks the retirement of Benjamin C. West as Superintendent of that office.

Ben came to work here as an electrician's helper at age 15 in 1942. For the past 44 years he has established a reputation for knowledge of the House, honesty, and dedication to excellence. Throughout a career of helping reporters understand and cover the House, he has never forgotten his loyalty to the House as an institution.

He has witnessed many notable events in his career, such as the Pumpkin Papers and Hollywood hearings of an Un-American Activities Committee in the 1940's; General MacArthur's farewell speech in 1951; the shooting in the House by Puerto Rican nationalists in 1954; and the impeachment hearings of 1974.

We in the House wish Ben well as he no doubt will go on to other achievements. According to rumor, if he can take time off from the golf course, he might write a book about the House. We hope he will stay on the fairways.

From the House to you, Ben, thanks for a long and dedicated career. We wish you the very best of retirement years.

INTRODUCTION OF HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION SAFETY AMENDMENTS OF 1986

(Mr. WIRTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Hazardous Materials Transportation Safety Amendments Act of 1986. This legislation is a comprehensive package of proposals designed to strengthen and coordinate hazardous materials transportation laws at the Federal, State, and local level.

Mr. Speaker, our current laws governing hazardous materials transportation are a mess. They are uncoordinated, confusing, and give little guidance in some areas to industry, States, and localities. Nearly every day we hear about a transportation accident involving hazardous materials somewhere in the country. Yet, we have not devoted necessary resources to ensuring the safe transportation of dangerous materials. Thus far, we have avoided a major mobile-Bhopal not because we have been smart, but because we have been lucky.

The bill I am introducing today will put some teeth into our truck safety laws. It will significantly beef up Federal and State safety inspection and audit capabilities. It will give guidance and incentives to States to designate routes and safe havens for trucks carrying hazardous materials. It will require drivers of dangerous materials to have proper training, to have only one license, and to maintain a safe driving record. It will provide critical emergency response training for local police and firefighters, who are often first on the scene of an accident.

Mr. Speaker, our Federal hazardous materials transportation laws are an accident waiting to happen. We cannot afford to wait any longer to give attention to this extremely important issue.

A MILD FORM OF LUNACY

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, John Sherman was among our ablest Secretaries of the Treasury. He was the author and architect of the 1879 resumption, following the greenback episode during the Civil War. He had also served long years in this House and in the Senate, before he served in the Cabinet. I wish to pay homage to this great statesman with the following quotation:

> There is a large class of people who believe that paper can be, and ought to be, made into money without any promise or hope of redemption; that is to say, a note should be printed: "This is a dollar", and be made into a legal tender.
> I regard this as a mild form of lunacy, and have no disposition to debate with men who indulge in such delusions, which have prevailed to some extent, at different times, in all countries, but whose life has been brief, and which have ever shared the fate of other popular delusions.
> I therefore dismiss such wild theories, and speak only to those who are willing to assume, as an axiom, that gold, or coined money, have been proven by all human experience to be the best possible standard of value, and that paper money is simply a promise to pay such coined money, and should be made and kept equal to coined money, by being convertible on demand. Why ought not anyone who issued a promise to pay on demand be made to pay it when demanded? (Recollections of Forty Years in the House, Senate, and Cabinet, by John Sherman, New York, 1895, pp. 589–591.)

A NEW DEFENSE FOR DRUG PUSHERS

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, by now we all know that the administration, in a three-page report to one of our colleagues, admits that the Contras have dealt in drugs as recently as 5 months ago when quote, and I am quoting from the report: "The rebel movement was particularly hard-pressed for financial support."

I ask you: Is this a new court defense for drug pushers? They could fight with "the Contra drug defense" every time: "I was financially desperate, so I had to push drugs on your children." This is a scandalous situation. The administration making excuses for drug dealers.

Today I invite my colleagues to join me in legislation prohibiting the sending of U.S. tax dollars to countries, groups, or organizations who are certified to be drug dealers.

Let us assure all Americans that their hard-earned tax dollars will be kept out of the hands of the drug underworld.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF BAY OF PIGS INVASION

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, today, our country and especially our Cuban-American citizens, will observe the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion. The failure of the U.S. Government to support the 1,453 men or Brigade 2506 who led the charge onto the swampy, southwestern coast of Cuba 25 years ago, signed the fate of the thousands of freedom loving Cubans and also had major U.S. foreign policy implications which are sadly, still very much alive today.

In remembering the Bay of Pigs, our initial thoughts are for those 274 men who gave their lives in battle with Castro's Communist forces. Their bravery was exemplary and their cause was worthy of the highest praise. These men and their surviving families represent the Cuban people's resolve against the Communist oppression Fidel Castro has brought to their proud island nation.

But we should also take this occasion, to review our Government's failure in the Bay of Pigs operation, not to find fault with those decisionmakers of 25 years ago, but to learn from it and not to make the same mistakes again.

On April 17, 1961, the United States had the opportunity to end a Communist presence in our backyard by simply giving minimal support to Cuban freedom fighters willing to give their lives to win freedom for their homeland. We had encouraged the Cuban Contras, but when the chips were down, we failed to give the promised support. Those who argued for appeasement and negotiation carried the day. Twenty-five years later, Fidel Castro and his Communist government remain a major threat to our national security and the people of Cuba are slaves to this totalitarian government. With assistance from the Soviet Union, Castro's Cuba not only survives but it trains and advises thousands of Communist revolutionaries in Latin America and Africa. Castro has never once been serious about negotiating any end to his tyranny or his activities to spread communism. Communists never give up their revolution.

On April 17, 1986, do we have the will to stop the spread of communism which we did not have 25 years ago? This time will we support freedom fighters willing to give their lives for a free Nicaragua or will we yield once more to the voices of appeasement and negotiation? Will we let freedom fail once again or will America wake up and say "no more" to communism's cruel hoax on the people of our hemisphere? That is the message and the challenge of the Bay of Pigs.

ECONOMIC GROWTH POOR DURING REAGAN YEARS

(Mr. OBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, Commerce Department economic growth estimates issued today are lower than the level projected in the President's budget and if the growth does not improve over the next 12 months, we could end up with $13 billion less in Federal revenues than was projected in the President's fiscal 1987 budget.

I suppose this can be viewed as good news in one sense, because the 3.2 rate of growth is only the eighth time in the full 20 quarters since President Reagan became President that the economy has grown at a rate equaling or exceeding the historical average; but economic growth under this administration, is still averaging only 2.1 percent a year, one-third slower than normal. It is the weakest record for economic growth for any administration during the last quarter century.

Today's $4.1 trillion estimated by the Commerce Department for the current level of gross national product leaves the economy about $200 billion smaller than it would have been if we had seen the historical average for growth between 1981 and the present.

That adds up to more than $2,000 a year in lost income for the typical American family. The cumulative economic loss to the economy because of slow growth since 1981 is more than $850 billion, and that means that if we were to sustain the higher growth levels being predicted by the administration for the remainder of the President's term, it would still be doubtful that the economy at this point would be able to match the pre-Reagan average for growth in the postwar era.

TOURISTS: VISIT ENGLAND INSTEAD

(Mr. MOORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, the refusal of France and Spain to allow American F-111 fighter bombers to enter their airspace to retaliate against Libyan terrorism concerns me as to whether they are dependable allies. Great Britain stood tall when it was time to get tough with terrorism, but they didn't.

Because of the decision by France and Spain, our F-111 pilots had to fly an additional 2,400 miles and 8 hours to carry out their mission. Those air crews were subjected to unnecessary fatigue, discomfort and peril due to their lack of cooperation from our supposed allies. Well, I'm mad and I hope all Americans are, too. So let's do something about it.

Therefore, I urge American tourists making plans to travel in Europe to boycott France and Spain and thank Margaret Thatcher by spending time and money in England.

The battle against terrorism cannot be compromised by the availability of a nearby barrel of Libyan oil, or by selling goods to Libya.

The battle against terrorism cannot be won by looking the other way in fear.

The battle against terrorism will be won by the brave and courageous who are willing to confront the source of terrorism directly and to take whatever action is necessary to bring it to its knees.

Mr. Speaker, I urge any tourist now planning on a vacation in France or Spain to change plans. Visit England instead.

MR. PRESIDENT, MAKE THESE TWO PHONE CALLS, PLEASE

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, conflict in this world seems inevitable, although regrettable. I would like to ask the President of the United States to make two phone calls today if he would. One, to follow up on my colleague, could be to the President of France, Mr. Mitterrand reminding him of 200 years of closeness between our two countries. The picture that hangs in this hall, General Lafayette, the Statue of Liberty, France has given us much and we have given in return; Argonne woods, Normandy, the Marshall Plan, forgiveness of war debts.

We ought to be closer, not further apart. The President ought to say that man to man. He should remind President Mitterrand that we expected more from France, and, frankly we deserved better.

The second call is tougher. It ought to be to Colonel Qadhafi. The President ought to call the colonel and say, "It breaks my heart to have killing on both sides, babies dead, men and women, innocent dead, American citizens dead."

He ought to make that call, and he ought to tell the colonel that "two men can stop it, you and me, and we ought to."

In a world grown smaller and tougher, the President ought to stand for peace, make the calls. Maybe they will not work, but why not try?

THE FREE TRADE AGREEMENT TALKS

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Trade Subcommittee of the other body announced that a majority of its members were willing to vote not to begin the Free Trade Agreement talks with our neighboring state of Canada. Again yesterday that subcommittee expressed its displeasure and it will vote on whether to go ahead with those talks or, rather, to stop them, on Tuesday next.

Understandably, there is frustration on the part of the members of that subcommittee. Some of their frustrations have, of course, no relation to trade with our neighbor to the north. I would urge caution on possible disruption of Canadian-United States relations. We have the longest unguarded border and the largest two-way trade between our nations. But that is really not important compared to the close relationship that we have achieved over the years. Killing this Free Trade Agreement aborning is not a way to call attention to the problem. That agreement may never be completed. It may not prevail, but we ought to try to complete it.

If we have to let it go, we can abandon it at any time. But we should not spoil our good relations with our neighbor to the north in a fit of pique.

ENCOURAGING DEVELOPMENTS SUPPORTIVE OF THE EFFORT TO END APARTHEID IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. CROCKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, in the face of the current violent and repressive realities in South Africa there emerged this week two developments which are both encouraging and supportive of the effort to end apartheid.

One action occurring here at home is the American Telephone and Telegraph Co.'s decision to terminate its investments, its sales and purchases, its long distance and data transmission services, and sever virtually all business ties in South Africa. This is the most comprehensive divestment movement of any American firm doing business in South Africa and significantly increases the pressure on the South African Government to end apartheid.

The second positive development is the election of Bishop Desmond Tutu to be the archbishop of Cape Town, a post which elevates him to head the Anglican Church in all of southern Africa. This honor comes at a time when Bishop Desmond Tutu, at the risk of being sent to jail on a charge of treason, has called on the World community to enact punitive economic sanctions against South Africa. His election signals a growing unity of black and white churchgoers in the continuing struggle to end apartheid by peaceful means.

Mr. Speaker, let us hope now that the next positive news from South Africa will be the release of Nelson Mandela and the start of meaningful political negotiations with that country's black majority.

WE MUST KEEP THE PROCESS GOING ON THE FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, our Founding Fathers in their wisdom decided on a bicameral legislature with differing terms; short term for the House, the people's body so that we would be responsive to the issues of the day, and a longer term for our colleagues in the other body.

I think were the Founding Fathers here today, they would walk these Halls and shake their heads because it is not working. Our relationship with our neighbor to the north, Canada, is of vital importance. They are our largest single trading partner in all the world. What the other body is doing with the Free Trade Agreement is despicable. We must keep the process going. We must initiate this process and work it through to its resolution.

If we think, or anyone thinks that it would be easier for our trade relations in the long run to negotiate such a treaty with the European Community or with the Pacific nations, they are absolutely wrong. We must do everything in our power to start negotiations with our neighbor, Canada.

LET'S RESTORE CONSUMER CONFIDENCE IN PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

(Mr. LUKEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, many Members have asked me about my bill H.R. 4428, which is a disclosure bill for health agencies such as nonprofit hospitals and other dispensers of prescription drugs. There is no doubt today that in our Nation's economy consumers have access to a variety of prescription drugs with proven safety and efficacy which is unmatched by any country in the world.

However, this is being undermined by a drug diversion market, a subtrade whereby inferior, ineffective, and contaminated pharmaceuticals make their way out of the pharmacy shelves and into the hands of consumers. These schemes have been uncovered by a series of undercover law enforcement operations and have been discussed in our Investigations Subcommittee.

They involve substandard, mislabled and counterfeit birth control pills, heart medications, ulcer drugs, among others. These are illegal drugs which have made their way into the legal marketplace. It appears that a great many of these potentially dangerous pharmaceuticals originate from health care institutions such as hospitals who purchase them because of their nonprofit exemption under the two-tier purchasing system of pharmaceuticals, purchase them at sometimes one-tenth of the cost which is charged to our pharmacies, to our retail or small pharmacies and also the chain store pharmacies. So because of this distribution system the nonprofits are unwitting accomplices, and this would require disclosure, what they buy and what they sell.

H.R. 281 INTERFERES WITH THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION AND OF SPEECH OF THE AMERICAN WORKING MAN AND WOMAN

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, this body is an exciting place to work, and the excitement comes all so often in the passion that our Members express for things we believe in dearly. I do not believe the passion is ever greater nor more sincere than when we speak on behalf of the protection of fundamental human rights. I dare say there is not a Member here who does not feel that passion in his heart and work very hard to protect human rights. Yet we have to be wise and we have to be diligent because those who would violate human rights might do so under the guise of the least harmless of legislation.

Today we will entertain H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendment Act. It seems to be a relatively harmless piece of legislation designed to do nothing but promote union membership. But if you look beneath the surface, if you look deep, you can see that it will do that if it passes by interfering with the fundamental rights of freedom of association and freedom of speech of the American working man and woman.

I do not believe this body is prepared to deny those basic rights to the working people of America in an effort to promote the lagging enrollment of union membership in the construction industry.

WE ARE VICTORIOUS

(Mr. OWENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, many people are confused about yesterday's activity on the floor of the House. They want to know did the people, the Members who are in favor of ending the folly in Central America, win a defeat or did they lose a victory?

I think it is clear there is no doubt in my mind that those of us who want to stop the escalation toward a wider war in Central American won a victory for the taxpayers of America yesterday.

One hundred million dollars, it means, will not go immediately down the drain. It may be postponed but certainly we will bide our time and wait. It will not go down the drain into a bottomless pit, and it will not end up where the $27 million already has gone, $7 million of which is not accounted for at all.
